Lone Inmate Tells of Life On New York's Death Row

Convicted of '74 Slaying, Davis Calls Existence 'Roughest' Experience

By NATHANIEL SHEPPARD Jr.

Joseph Eli Davis spends 23 hours of each day locked in an 8-by-6-foot cell under extraordinary security precautions in a remote area of Green Haven prison known as K Gallery. K Gallery is more commonly known as Death Row, and Mr. Davis is its only occupant.

He is allowed out of his cell for one hour each day, to shower and to exercise in the small holding tank in front of the 13 cells that make up Death Row or on the badly weathered 20-by-40-foot roof area that serves as its recreation yard.

Unlike the other 1,340 inmates at the prison in Stormville, N. Y., near Poughkeepsie, Mr. Davis is not allowed to have contact visits and may not make telephone calls. He also is not allowed to use a knife or fork with his meals and may not keep a pencil, comb, razor or toothbrush in his cell.

It is the state's way of making sure that Mr. Davis, who was convicted last year of the slaying of Harold Woods, a Yonkers policeman, in 1974, does not resort to suicide to escape his sentence of death in the electric chair.

Two weeks ago, a State Supreme Court justice held unconstitutional the state law making the death penalty

Policeman's Widow Feels Accused Should Pay Price Under the State Law

By JOSEPH B. TREASTER

Dorothy Donohue doesn't cry so much anymore.

She used to be married to a policeman, who a little more than two years ago was killed when he came across a robbery in a grocery store on his way to work at the Yonkers Police Department. He was in civilian clothes, but he identified himself as a policeman, and he was struck with a single, fatal shot in the throat.

Mrs. Donohue is now married to a plumber, who she says is very good with her three sons, and her life is less painful.

But people keep wanting to talk with her these days about the death of the policeman, Officer Harold Woods, because a State Supreme Court justice has declared that New York's death penalty for killing policemen is unconstitutional. And the justice says that the man convicted of killing Officer Woods, the only man on Death Row in New York, should not go to the electric chair.

Mrs. Donohue finds the decision almost incomprehensible. First there was the death penalty, she notes. Then there wasn't. Then there was. Now maybe there isn't again.

She sat quietly the other day in the family den of the yellow ranch-style

INACTION ON LOBBYING BY KOREA IS LINKED TO ITS VIETNAM ROLE

President Park Ousts Intelligence Official Reportedly in Charge of Seoul's Agents in Washington

By RICHARD HALLORAN

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13—A former State Department official in charge of Korean affairs has asserted that senior officials of the Nixon Administration did little to curb an improper South Korean lobby here because they did not want to jeopardize the Korean commitment of 52,000 troops to the war in Vietnam.

Donald K. Ranard, director of the Office of Korean Affairs from 1970 through 1974, said in an interview that senior Administration officials were preoccupied with the Vietnam War in the early 1970's, when the Korean lobby started, and did not want to embarrass an ally.

In Seoul, meanwhile, President Park Chung Hee has secretly dismissed the official of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency who was reported to be in charge of the agency's network of operatives in Washington. The dismissal was said to have resulted from the official's failure to warn the President of the dangers of overexposure of South Korean lobbying activities in the United States. [Page 25]

No Policy on Lobbying

Mr. Ranard, who was in a position to know most of what went on inside the Government on Korean issues, said he could recall no specific policy guidance on this question but he added:

"There was always a feeling below the surface that the Korea lobby was to be left alone. We were in a position where we thought we needed them in Vietnam. We sure weren't going to be rapping their knuckles in Washington when we needed their help elsewhere."

Mr. Ranard recalled that American officials had to persuade the South Koreans to release American-built F-5 jet fighters to the South Vietnamese. In another instance, he said, President Nixon wrote a personal letter to President Park Chung Hee asking him to keep Korean forces in Vietnam longer than planned.

Now the director of the Center for International Policy, an organization here concerned with the study of human rights and foreign policy, Mr. Ranard said that he had repeatedly brought the Korean lobby to the attention of his superiors. He said there had been no deliberate attempt at a coverup; it was simply that nothing was ever done about the lobby.

Others With the Knowledge

Mr. Ranard said that William P. Rogers, then Secretary of State; Henry A. Kissinger, then Presidential assistant for national security affairs and currently Secretary of State, and William B. Saxbe, Attorney General in the latter days of the Nixon Administration, had been informed on the Korean operation.

The former Secretary of Defense, Melvin R. Laird, said this week that he had been aware of an improper Korean lobby and had warned the State Department about it. He also said he had warned the South Koreans that it was harmful.

A memorandum written by U. Alexis Johnson, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, the top career position in the department, shows that he knew about the Korean operation in 1971. Mr. Laird also said that William J. Porter,

Northeast Democratic Governors Drafting Aid Requests for Carter

Special to The New York Times

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N.Y., NOV. 13—Democratic Governors of seven Northeastern states met in this Revolutionary War hamlet today, optimistic about putting together the shopping list for Federal aid to the Northeast that would be looked on favorably by the incoming Administration of President-elect Jimmy Carter.

The President-elect had been invited to attend the conference, but his post-election vacation prevent him from meeting with the Governors. However, Mr. Carter sent Stuart Eizenstate, his director of policy issues, to represent him at the conference.

"Jimmy Carter has let us know already that he is in sympathy with what we are trying to do," said Governor Carey of New York, chairman of the Coalition of Northeastern Governors, a group formed last June to lobby for Federal assistance on a regional basis.

"Everybody knows the problems and they have been studied to death," said Gov. Michael S. Dukakis of Massachusetts, declaring that Washington "for too long" has failed to change aid formulas that channel an uneven proportion of Federal dollars to the South and West in contrast to the higher proportion of Federal taxes paid in the Northeast.

More than 100 economists, bankers, professors and politicians participated today in workshops on welfare, transportation, energy, manpower, unemployment and economic stabilization. The workshop recommendations will be distilled by the Governors tomorrow for what Mr. Carey said would be "an agenda for action."

"There's a lot of symbolism here," Governor Carey said, noting that the "turning point" of the Revolutionary War

Superhighway System, in 20 Years, Has Tied a Vast Nation Together

By WILLIAM K. STEVENS

Special to The New York Times

TOPEKA, Kan., Nov. 13—No bands will play. No birthday parties are planned. Few people hereabouts are even aware of the occasion—not even here in the wide open spaces, where superhighways are not only an inseparable part of the free life but almost an article of faith.

That is perhaps one measure of how thoroughly taken for granted, and how deeply embedded in American life, the greatest public works project in history (so it is called) has become.

Twenty years ago tomorrow, on Nov. 14, 1956, an eight-mile stretch of concrete roadway was opened to traffic in the subtly flowing Flint Hills six and a half miles west of Topeka. With that, the creation of the Interstate Highway System began in earnest. The eight-mile segment of what is now Interstate 70 was the first in the country to be completed with funds provided by the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956, the law that effectively brought the Interstate System into being by paying 90 percent of its cost.

Two decades later, it is clear that the impact of the Interstate System on the national life has been immeasurable. It has extended the practical horizons of the everyday citizen by leagues, and become the ultimate agent of his liberation from the bonds of geography.

With Walt Whitman, he can say, "I inhale great draughts of space, the east and the west are mine, and the north and the south are mine."

The system has drawn the regions of the country closer together within themselves. It has changed the country's patterns of commerce, work and recreation, altered its personal relationships and even its perceptions: Distance is now conceived in hours instead of miles.

The interstate highways have made fortunes for some and ruined others; meant prosperity for some towns and stagnation for others; created a whole new class of freeway oases near interchanges across the continent.

The system has saved tens of thousands of lives, but is attacked as a concrete juggernaut that has both ravaged nature

Vietnam Statement on U.S. Talks Seen as Sign of Future Progress

By FLORA LEWIS

Special to The New York Times

PARIS, Nov. 13—Although the State Department said that during the talks with Vietnam here yesterday there was no progress on the issue of Americans missing in action, French diplomatic sources took the communiqué issued late last night by the Vietnamese delegation as an encouraging sign that serious negotiations can begin once there is a new administration in Washington.

The Vietnamese statement said that Hanoi was "disposed toward an exchange of views on the problems which preoccupy the American side and to meet fully its obligations under Article 8B of the Paris-Vietnam accords." Article 8B requires a complete accounting of the fate of all missing American servicemen and every possible effort to locate and repatriate the remains of those who died.

The United States has demanded a full report on the missing as a precondition for the much broader talks on "normalization of relations in the mutual interest of both parties" that the Vietnamese say they want.

U.S. Could Withdraw Issue

This condition somewhat puzzles the Vietnamese negotiators, according to neutral sources, since it arbitrarily provides them with bargaining cards they would not otherwise hold. They are presumably aware that the United States has the ability to remove the issue when it chooses.

This is because it is generally believed by American officials that all living American prisoners have been returned and that those listed as missing are almost certainly dead.

A reliable source said that the Department of Defense has been considering an announcement that the 800 listed as missing must be presumed dead. Such a move was being prepared by the Pentagon and

THE BIG APPLE
To New York
With Love

In April of this year, the Mayor's Committee in the Public Interest commissioned Cartier to design and make a one-of-a-kind jewelled Big Apple. Our designers and craftsmen have devoted seven months to the task and have now finished this extraordinary project. This golden apple, studded with rubies, emeralds and a single diamond, is mounted on a base of polished mahogany. This remarkable creation will be offered at auction with all proceeds to benefit the Committee's Big Apple Campaign, which seeks to improve the quality of life in our city.

The Big Apple has these precious ingredients:

Rubies: 77 carats	18k gold: 96 grams
Emeralds: 5 carats	Platinum: 3 grams
Diamonds: 2 carats	Silver: 150 grams

The Big Apple can be seen in our new High Jewelry Salon from November 15 through the 22nd. It will be sold to a concerned New York citizen or corporation at an auction on the evening of November 22.

The Big Apple opens to reveal a miniature pendant version on a gold and diamond necklace.

Improper South Korean lobbying in Washington was not significantly acted on by senior Nixon Administration officials because they did not want to jeopardize Seoul's commitment of 52,000 troops to the Vietnam War, according to a former State Department official in charge of Korean affairs. He said in an interview that the Nixon officials did not want to embarrass an ally. [Page 1, Column 6.]

The third-ranking official of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency, who was reportedly responsible for coordinating activities of Korean operatives in Washington, has been dismissed by President Park Chung Hee. The operatives were said to include Park Tong Sun, a businessman, and Pak Bo Hi, a major official in the Rev. Sun Myuong Moon's church. [25:1-6.]

Optimism over the prospect of future American-Vietnamese negotiations was expressed by French diplomatic sources despite an American statement that no progress was made at a Paris meeting Friday. The French cited a Vietnamese communiqué saying that Hanoi was willing to meet fully its obligations to account for all missing American servicemen and make every possible effort to find and return bodies of those killed. [1:4-5.]

National

The Defense Department is trying to work out an arrangement to relieve Jimmy Carter of the need to make a major decision on the future of the B-1 bomber program soon after he becomes President. Pentagon officials said the plan would allow production to proceed but in a way that would not "box in" Mr. Carter. [1:1.]

The Interstate Highway System, 20 years old today, has had a profound impact on American life. The superhighways, with 90 percent financing by the Federal Government, have drawn regions closer together, changed the nation's patterns of commerce, work and recreation and speeded the flow of people and businesses far outward from the central cities. Beirut's 'Peace' Mood: Gunmen Hide Their Arms

By JAMES F. CLARITY

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 13—In the ruins of the downtown port area, the Mediterranean is visible in blue patches framed by smashed buildings and holes in walls. But along the major street running up the hill from the port, the gunmen are not looking at the sea and the shooting continues even though the end of the 19-month civil war seems to be approaching.

On the south side of the street, Palestinian guerrillas crouch behind barriers to avoid gunfire and mortar explosions coming from the rightist Christians a few hundred yards away. The Palestinians poke their own machine guns through windows of a burned-out office building that once housed the Haddad Bank and shoot back.

They do not consider that they are violating the cease-fire. They are responding, they say, to violations by the other side.

There is some nervous comic relief at a barricade of rocks, sand and wooden doors set up by the Palestinians across Allenby Street. A guerrilla advises four Western correspondents that the safest way to cross behind the barricades is to run in a low and fast duck waddle.

One of the correspondents slips on a loose stone or empty cartridge and sprawls on the ground, losing his eyeglasses and scraping an ankle. He crawls the last few yards to safety and as soon as his colleagues realize he has not been shot, the ankle scrape becomes a joke, a testament to clumsiness.

Sniper Killed Palestinian at Site

Later, a Palestinian guerrilla laughs and says that a week ago a rightist sniper killed a Palestinian at the same barricade.

Around the corner from the line of fire, guerrillas sit and brew good tea and say they are not happy about the coming of Syrian troops and tanks, expected tomorrow or Monday to establish a truce buffer through the heart of the city and thereby presumably end the war.

The guerrillas say that the coming of the Syrians means that the Palestinian activity in Lebanon will be reduced and their efforts to harass Israel will be weakened.

The conversation turns abruptly from politics and war when a tall middle-aged woman wearing sunglasses and an expensive knit dress strolls through the rubble in the street, smiles and says "Markhaba," or "Hello," to the guerrillas. They say she is French or Hungarian and comes back nearly every day to look at the apartment she lived in before the civil war started more than a year and a half ago.

At the other end of the battle line, on the eastern edge of the city near the Church of St. Michel, there is calm at the barricade. The Syrians are only a few hundred yards away and are expected at any hour to come over and replace the guerrillas.

Under the peace agreement approved by Arab leaders last month, the combatants are supposed to give most of their heavy weapons to the Syrians, who are acting as the officially designated peacekeeping force but are widely considered here as an army of occupation.

The machine guns and mortars and grenade-propelling guns of the guerrillas are furtively removed from the barricade area, put in trucks and disappear.

Subsidi- m Switzerland, Johnson the United States, and Hochst from West Germany are among the foreign companies here that account for almost 80 percent of drug sales.

There are 14,700 drugs sold here—most of them copies of the same drugs but under different brand names. Critics of the pharmaceutical industry maintain that this multiplicity of drugs and the aggressive way in which they are marketed have cut deeply into the budget of poorer consumers and, in many cases, have led to the uncontrolled widespread use of medicines with potentially harmful side effects.

As is the case in developed countries, doctors are a major target of efforts by pharmaceutical companies to market their drugs. Salesmen, peddling literature and samples, are a common sight at clinics and physicians' offices. But spokesmen for the pharmaceutical industry maintain that it is a mistake to assume that doctors are confused by the increasing array of brand drugs.

"The idea that a physician has to contend with thousands of different medicines is absurd," said Mr. Moura. "Most doctors have a limited range of drugs that they prescribe within their specialty."

But in Brazil, as in other developing countries, self-prescription of drugs is widespread, reaching well over half of total sales, according to Government estimates.

With a scarcity of doctors and the expense of medical visits, many Brazilians depend on pharmacists or even popular hearsay in selecting medicines.

Drugs Sold Without Prescription

Of the 20 drugs that are sold most, 9 are antibiotics, which consumers often buy without prescription to treat infections that may not respond to such medicines or common colds caused by viruses that are immune to antibiotics.

In a recent interview with a local newspaper, a leading spokesmen for pharmacists acknowledged that he and his colleagues often prescribe 9 drugs to their clients despite laws against the unauthorized practice of medicine.

"We all have a bit of the doctor and the crazyman in us," said Geraldo Esteves Areal, president of the Drugstore Owners Association. "How many lives have been saved thanks to the alertness of pharmacists? I myself have had the chance to prevent people from dying."

Drug industry spokesmen maintain that it is up to the Government to enforce laws against the sale of medicines without prescription. Health Ministry officials concede that they have neither the budget nor the personnel to carry out these regulations, and insist that the drug industry shares major responsibility for such illegal sales.

Who is going to believe that the drug firms are not aware that half or more of their products are sold without doctors prescriptions? asked a ministry official.

In the course of a recent congressional inquiry on pharmaceuticals, a document, purported to be a salesman's manual from a leading drug company, indicated that at least some companies count on pharmacists and consumers to propagate prescription drugs.

"As we know," the manual stated in reference to a prescription drug, "this kind of product will be continuously sought by the clients and these clients in turn can be an excellent source of publicity for the product."

According to drugstore owners, they are under considerable pressure from pharmaceutical companies to buy—and subsequently sell—unwanted medicines.

"When there is a medicine that is in a great demand, we are obligated to make a large purchase, including other products, to renew our inventories because otherwise the laboratories will not supply our needs," said Mr. Esteves Areal.

Pharmaceutical companies have recently come under criticism for selling products that have been labeled ineffective by the United States Food and Drug Administration. According to a list printed during the last two weeks by local newspapers, more than 40 brand drugs pointed to by the F.D.A. are still available here.

The practice is widespread throughout the developing world, according to a report issued last year by Dr. Halfdan Mahler, director general of the World Health Organization.

"Products not meeting the quality requirements of the exporting country," stated Dr. Mahler, "may be exported to developing countries that are not in a position to carry out quality control measures. While these practices may conform to legal requirements, they are unethical and detrimental to health."

Mr. Moura, the president of the pharmaceutical industry association, maintains that "Brazil has no reason to follow the F.D.A. guidelines."

"Every country has its own guidelines," he said. "I think that in Brazil the authorities have the capacity to control the quality of pharmaceuticals."

Under the right-wing military regime that has governed Brazil for 12 years, an effort was initially made by the health authorities to contain the increased spread of drugs and build up a national industry that could develop and produce medicines at low prices. But the Government program may have inadvertently aided the expansion of the number of drugs now available on the market, without any lowering of prices.

Like some other developing countries, Brazil decided that it would not recognize drug patents. As a result, the small Brazilian-owned laboratories have put on sale hundreds of drugs that are virtual copies of the plethora of brands marketed by the multinational companies.

"We are not interested in seeing the proliferation of drugs," said Adm. Gerson Coutinho, who heads the Government's Center of Medicines, which oversees the drug industry. "Three hundred drugs are probably enough to treat any type of disease. But if we eliminated copies, it would be difficult for the national drug industry to survive."

Partial List of Drugs U.S. Calls Ineffective

Following is a partial list of drugs that Brazilian newspapers published as having been ruled 'ineffective' by the Food and Drugs Administration. The companies that produce them are in parentheses. end italic Albamycin gu (Upjohn), combination of antibiotic and sulfa drug for infections of urinary tract.

Albamycin T (Upjohn), combination of two antibiotics used for tonsillitis and penumonia.

Furacin (Eaton), for gynecological infections.

Furoxone (Eaton) for intestinal parasites.

Hydergine (Sandoz) for circulatory disorders.

Parenzime aqueous (Richardson Merrell) for inflamations.

Phenergan cream (Rhodia) for skin inflammations caused by insect bites.

Progestoral (Organon) hormone treatment for prevention of miscarriages.

Depo provera, hormone treatment for prevention of miscarriages.

Sigmamycin (Pfizer) antibiotic.

Statrol, an ophthalmic solution for conjunctivitis.

Tetrex apc or tolserol (Squibb) treatment of rheumatism.

Wycillin sm 400 (Wyeth) antiblotic.

Dr. Paul Bryant, project director of the Drug Efficacy Study Implementation for the Bureau of Drugs, said that the F.D.A. has no control over drugs sold or manufactured outside the United States. If the drugs are shipped from the United States, they must adhere to F.D.A. guidelines, he said. So Brazil does not have to follow the F.D.A. regulations, in this case.

The Food and Drug Administration confirmed that it had ruled the drugs listed above as ineffective.

ARGENTINA STEPS UP WAR AGAINST LEFTISTS

Security Sources Are Pleased With Results, but the Fight Seems Far From Over

By JUAN de ONIS

BUENOS AIRES, Nov. 13—Argentina's war against left-wing subversion has intensified with nearly 100 suspected guerrillas killed in the past two weeks. But political assassinations and bombings contributed to continued insecurity in many sectors.

The killing of six suspected guerrillas last night in La Plata, capital of Buenos Aires Province, raised the death toll in political violence this year to 1,230. Hundreds more have disappeared in mysterious arrests or abductions.

Highly placed security sources said the military operations against urban guerrillas concentrated in major industrial centers are going very well for the Government. But the fight is clearly far from over.

The discovery of two clandestine arms factories in the industrial suburbs of this capital showed that guerrilla organizations are manufacturing thousands of automatic pistols and grenades in secret shops.

"If some of the thousands of weapons we have found in these deposits had been distributed they would have armed a small army," a security source said.

But left-wing Peronist Montoneros and the badly mauled People'sR evoonaryutil tthe badly mauled People's Revolutionary Army, a Marxist group, are not now engaging in frontal conflicts with the military and police.

Until the end of last year, before the armed forces took full power here, the guerrillas had attacked provincial army garrisons and even tried to assault a major arsenal at Quilmes, outside this capital, in an attempt to capture weapons. About 100 guerrillas were killed in the unsuccessful attack.

The guerrillas have answered the growing pressure from security forces with terrorist tactics, mainly hit-and-run assassinations of business executives and secondary military personnel, who have no bodyguards, and bombings inside military and police installations.

Members Are From Many Areas

Guerrilla leaders such as Mario Fermenich of the Montoneros and the late Mario Roberto Santucho, killed recently by a army search party in a hideout, have long been underground. But many members of the organizations apparently are students, workers, office managers, physicians or young men doing military service.

Operating in small cells directed by a clandestine leader, these units can shoot down a business executive as he leaves his home for work. In the past two weeks they killed Carlos Roberto Souto, head of Chrysler's industrial laboratory, and Carlos Valentin Aguirre, who until recently was purchasing manager for Grafa, a major industrial company. Seven such killings have taken place in the past two months.

A bomb exploded this week inside one of Argentina's key security installations, the police headquarters in La Plata, capital of Buenos Aires Province. Col. Ernesto Klotz, an army officer who is second in command of the Buenos Aires Province police, lost an arm. A civilian employed in the police center has been accused of being a Montonero and of somehow smuggling the bomb into the Colonel's office.

The response to the guerrilla activity has been brutal. Since the bomb blast at the La Plata police station, security authorities have reported that 40 guerrillas have been killed in the La Plata area, allegedly in clashes with military or police patrols.

Adm. Emilio Massera, commander of the navy and a member of the ruling junta who has taken an increasingly hard-line position, said in a speech that anyone who proposes any pact, or any conversation to settle the conflict by peaceful means will be considered guilty of high treason.

So the guerrillas maintain the campaign of terror, including threats and bombings that have led to the resignation of the deans of law and medicine at the University of Buenos Aires, and the military is not expected to modify a policy that has been defined as extermination of the left-wing subversives.

U.N. Delegates to Hear the Plans For South-West Africa Book Ship

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., Nov. 13—A group setting out to sail a cargo of books 7,000 miles to South-West Africa has asked for a chance to describe its plans to United Nations delegates.

The group calls itself "Operation Namibia"—Namibia is the name used by nationalist forces for the South African-controlled territory—and has secured the support of the American Friends Service Committee and the South-West African People's Organization, the nationalist organization recognized by the United Nations.

The group plans to sail from Britain next week after an eight-member crew completes training. A spokesman for the group, who was received here by United Nations officials, said that a hearing had been requested for representatives to appear here before the United Nations Council for Namibia.

The spokesman, Linda Munes of Philadelphia, said the books aboard the vessel, the Golden Harvest, were intended for people in South-West Africa otherwise unable to obtain them. Some are literary and political works, some history and economics textbooks and others are listed as having been banned by the South African Government. One banned book is the children's classic "Black Beauty," presumably prohibited because of its title.

Soviet Oil Experts in Jordan

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 13 (Reuters)—Four Soviet experts have arrived here on a three-week visit to discuss exploration for oil, the Jordanian news agency announced. The Russian arrival is linked to a cooperation agreement signed by King Hussein when he visited Moscow in the summer. Earlier drilling in Jordan by Americans, Yugoslavs, West Germans, Canadians and Britons yielded no oil. The Russians are expected to explore in a desert region where the Yugoslavs drilled without success.

Mummy of Ramses II, with damaged area circled, that French scientists say is being treated for infestation by insects, fugi and other bacteria.

PARIS EXPERTS SPURN CHARGES ON MUMMY

Insist That Ramses Relic Is in Poor Condition—Credentials of Critic From U.S. Are Impugned

PARIS, Nov. 13—French scientists have rejected with indignation allegations published in the United States that they fabricated a threat to the preservation of a royal mummy to get it to Paris for reasons of prestige.

The mummy is that of Ramses II, one of ancient Egypt's greatest rulers, whose embalmed remains are undergoing examination here with a view to treatment against what is described as an onslaught by insects, fungi and bacteria.

Dr. James Harris, a University of Michigan researcher who has frequently X-rayed the royal mummies in Cairo, was quoted in news articles as saying that the mummy was in no way deteriorating, that its preservation was not threatened by "bacteria, fungus or anything else" and that suggesting an infection amounted to a scientific fabrication serving diplomatic ends.

Dr. Harris and an Egyptian museum official, Dr. Ibrahim Nawawy, were quoted in paraphrase to the effect that they felt that France wanted to exhibit the mummy as part of a big Ramses art show here earlier this year and used the deterioration idea as a pretext to get around Egypt's reluctance to have its most venerated relic go abroad.

The reaction by the French scientists involved was sharp.

"A nauseating, uncalled-for attack," said Dr. Christiane Desroches-Noblecourt, head of the Egyptian department at the Louvre and organizer of the Ramses exhibition. The case has already been settled, she added, because it has been established that "microorganisms, fungi and modern insects have indeed created grave damage to the mummy."

Prof. Lionel Balout, a leading anthropologist who has custody of the mummy at the Musée de l'Homme, added that all that remained was the precise identification of the organisms.

Dr. Maurice Bucaille, an Egyptologist and physician from whom the Egyptians commissioned an expert appraisal of the mummy and who first sounded the alert, added a series of arguments in support of the French view.

First, he told an interviewer, a number of the royal mummies are in a state of grave deterioration, so the condition of the Ramses mummy is consistent with that.

Second, Dr. Bucaille said, if the mummies survived over more than 3,000 years, it was not alone because of the embalming but in good part because they were hidden in caves, largely preserved from humidity and heat. In 1865, he recalled, the Ramses mummy was unsheathed for examination and exhibited in the Egyptian Museum of Cairo. There, he added, it was lying beneath a glass lid in nonantiseptic conditions, and in the heat.

Third, Dr. Bucaille said, a comparison of a 1912 photograph and photos taken in 1975 show that fissures on the abdomen are longer, broader and more numerous, while other pictures and X-rays show fissures on the shoulders and, in great numbers, on the legs.

Dr. Bucaille questioned Dr. Harris's credibility by saying that if the American, a dentist, had X-rayed mummies, he never received authorization to do so. Dr. Bucaille added that Dr. Harris was the co-author of a book, "X-raying the Pharaohs," in which "every page is studded with mistakes, from the wrong age for Ramses to the Pharaoh's molars, which a caption says are missing when a photograph shows they are not."

Both Dr. Desroches-Noblecourt and Dr. Bucaille said that if a few Egyptian Museum officials disputed deterioration of the royal mummies, it could only be that they felt somewhat guilty since, after all, they had the responsibility. In any case, the scientists said, the museum officials were overruled by the Director of Antiquities, Gamal Mokhtar, who recommended an urgent examination in Paris.

VIETNAM STATEMENT SEEN AS ENCOURAGING

would probably have been taken late this year had President Ford been re-elected. Now the decision is expected to be left to President-elect Carter.

It would have important political as well as economic implications in the United States. So long as the servicemen are listed as missing, their families receive their full pay with combat bonuses and all benefits. When they are pronounced dead, there is a lump-sum settlement and pension rights go into effect.

A declaration changing the status of the list would remove the major obstacle on the American side to proceeding with substantive negotiations.

The United States hinted that it was interested in moving on to broader political and economic issues when it referred in its bland announcement yesterday to talks with the "Socialist Republic of Vietnam."

That is the new name that Hanoi has chosen for the unified country. The American use of the name indicated that Washington does not intend to haggle over the question of recognition or to recall the clauses in the 1973 accords on South Vietnam and the role of the now-defunct Saigon government.

When Deputy Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach of Vietnam was visiting Paris last month, shortly before the American elections, he expressed the hope that a new United States administration "will be more far-sighted than its predecessor."

The conciliatory tone of the Vietnamese communique after yesterday's talks seemed to reflect both this expectation and a realization that the United States can at any time withdraw the issue of the missing servicemen.

Instead of demanding as in the past that the United States fulfill Article 21 of the Paris agreements pledging American aid for reconstruction throughout Indochina simultaneously with a Vietnamese accounting of the missing, the statement simply said that aid was an American "obligation."

"This is not only a question of right, but also a question of honor, of responsibility and of conscience," the communique said, a much softer phrasing than in some past Hanoi declarations linking aid with war reparations and an acknowledgement of aggressive guilt.

Hanoi called for "carrying out what had been agreed in the mixed economic commission in Paris in 1973." In those negotiations, which continued here for several months after the formal agreements, the United States offered postwar aid but firmly refused to consider it as anything but a gesture of good will for the future.

Negotiations Trailed Off

The details of how far the mixed economic commission got were never fully published. Negotiations trailed off after American prisoners were returned and fighting continued in the South. When North Vietnamese forces began the offensive that led to collapse of the South Vietnamese government last year, the United States said that this was a violation of the Paris pact, canceling American obligations under the accord.

But Hanoi's reference to the economic commission's negotiations now appeared to scale down the sweeping reconstruction demands it had been making and to open the way for an initial compromise on terms the United States had already been prepared to accept.

The American delegates left Paris after yesterday's meeting and were understood to have flown to Washington. No date was set for the next meeting so far as could be learned.

Yugoslav Court Upholds Challenge To System of Political Favoritism

By MALCOLM W. BROWNE
Special to The New York Times

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia, Nov. 13—A Yugoslav constitutional court, ruling in favor of a worker denied an apartment for political reasons, has challenged the party patronage system under which special benefits are reserved for the most active Communists.

Though the court decision affects only one enterprise in the constitutent republic of Serbia, it may have a far-reaching impact.

The case involves Nada Maric, a 30-year-old typist at the government's oil products concern Jugopetrol, who had been seeking housing for years. Housing of any kind, especially in Belgrade, is scarce, in common with the other Communist countries. But government workers may receive assistance from their employers or trade unions.

Mrs. Maric had worked for Jugopetrol for 16 years. Although she has an invalid husband and two children, she was still living in a shack in Novi Beograd, a Belgrade suburb.

Point System of Priorities

In awarding housing to workers, Jugopetrol has had a point system for determining priorities, including points awarded for political activity. Political points, up to 10, could be awarded by management, the union and other "socio-political organizations," all basically controlled by the Communist Party.

Under the point system, Mrs. Maric had reached the top of the waiting list and was about to receive an apartment to rent when another worker with fewer overall points successfully appealed for more political points. Mrs. Maric had only two points and her rival, after appeal, was awarded seven.

Earlier this year, Mrs. Maric felt so confident she would win her struggle for housing that she moved into the new apartment she believed she would be awarded, only to be evicted.

Since the court decision, Yugoslav newspapers have hailed Mrs. Maric for her tenacity and have condemned Jugopetrol's political point system. It has now been eliminated.

Politican Activity Questioned

"Political activity cannot be neglected," the Belgrade newspaper Politika said, "if one knows that it can secure 10 precious points, just as many points as, for example, diligence at work, or poor health."

The newspaper asked: "Must the right to an apartment depend on political activity? Does not work determine the material and social position of a person?"

The case of Mrs. Maric is unlikely to cause profound change in a system under which the party has the power and will to look after its own. Gifted students whose parents are not Communists and who, themselves, have refused to join Communist youth organizations frequently find it impossible to gain admission to the best schools. Access to the better jobs also depends on membership in the party.

The incentives to join the party are thus great and membership requirements in Yugoslavia are more relaxed than in the Soviet bloc. In the first six months of this year alone, the party acquired 105,000 new members bringing it to 1.4 million.

...cil of Europe Measure for the Suppression of Terrorism Seems Likely to Be Adopted

New York Times

...In response to deep ...reat of terrorist acts ...Ireland, the Basque ..., the Council of Eu... a convention for the ...ism.

...vention abolishes the ...ween politically moti... ordinary crime. It ...extradition of terror... where their act was ...atively, prompt trial ...re they took refuge and were caught. It also calls for collaboration in tracking them down.

However, one clause in the convention exempts those cases where there would be "serious reasons to believe" that the request for extradition was motivated by "considerations of race, religion, nationality or political opinion."

To go into force the convention, which was unanimously adopted Wednesday at Strasbourg, France, must be ratified by at least three countries in the 19-member body. It would then be valid in their territory and would gradually be extended as other countries ratify in turn.

Because legislation against terrorism is such a pressing need, it was widely felt here that there was every likelihood that the convention would be adopted, thought it might be amended.

The Council of Europe, founded 27 years ago in the hope that it would soon grow into the government of a united Europe, still has only consultative status, but it can propose joint legislation to the members. The council has no organic link with the European Economic Community, but that organization's nine members are all also members of the council.

The convention on stemming terrorism is the council's 88th; more than half have been ratified by at least three members.

Upon an initiative by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of West Germany, the Common Market members are working on joint rules for dealing with the more specific issue of suppressing the taking of hostages. A spokesman for the Council of Europe said that those rules and the convention might ultimately be linked.

The convention lists the following as acts of terrorism: hijacking, taking hostages, abduction, sequestration, the use of bombs, grenades and firearms, any infringement on the rights of diplomats, damage to public buildings. It states that no such act, attempt at such an act or complicity in it will henceforth be considered "a breach of law inspired by political motives."

Right-of-Asylum Clauses

Under right-of-asylum clauses in many constitutions, governments can refuse to extradite those sought for political acts to other countries. Under the convention, governments would have to extradite or try the terrorists.

France appears to be reluctant to vote for the convention because ratification would involve a change in the constitutional provision of asylum in cases of political crime. Similar problems could arise elsewhere, notably the Scandinavian countries.

On the basis of an Irish proposal, the convention declares national criminal courts to be competent to try, judge and punish any person having committed a terrorist act on the territory of another signatory.

The convention was drafted by a special committee working at the council's headquarters in Strasbourg. The vote was taken by the deputies of the member countries' foreign ministers.

Bicentennial Decals Recall Friendship Of Austria for U.S.

By PAUL HOFMANN

VIENNA, Nov. 13 — The American Bicentennial star has become almost as ubiquitous here as the portrait of Emperor Francis Joseph.

Nearly half a million Austrians, one out of 15 citizens of this small country, have put decals on autos, store windows and walls.

The stars have been selling most of the year at almost $3 in a fund-raising drive linked to a Government-sponsored lottery. In weekly drawings those who bought stars won cars, color television sets and trips to the United States.

Further, one of three American universities stands to win a fully endowed chair in Austrian studies. The Government has pledged to match the money raised by the lottery drive—$1.3 million—with budget funds to finance the project, conceived as a multidisciplinary position with leading scholars from Austria taking turns.

Kreisky to Seek Advice

Half a dozen institutions of higher learning have shown interest. This week a special committee decided that the professorship would go to Yale, the University of Minnesota or Stanford. Prime Minister Bruno Kreisky said he would seek advice from the incoming administration of President-elect Jimmy Carter on the choice.

Mr. Kreisky, a Social Democrat, began the star campaign. "A lot of Austrians do not know what the United States has done for our country," he explained, "for the simple reason that they were not around after World War II."

Parallel to the lottery the Government distributed hundreds of thousands of copies of a booklet, "America and Us," which recalls the United States' assistance to Austria.

...ion Polls Are Thriving in Spain, but the Findings Are Uncertain and Many People Are 'Don't Knows'

...AMES M. MARKHAM
...ial to The New York Times

...Nov. 13—Public-opinion polls ...s are entering their golden ...

... ago Prime Minister Carlos ...o, upset by newspaper-spon...at asked questions that had ...d publicly in decades, issued ...hobbled polling.

...lays," commented Juan Diez ...8-year-old American-trained ...n is the head of the Govern...stitute of Public Opinion, ...eeded to know the opinion ...

The death of that man, Francisco Franco, and the advent last summer of the youthful, publicity-conscious Cabinet of Prime Minister Adolfo Suárez has altered the polling scene markedly.

Premier Taking Public Pulse

The anti-polling decree has lapsed, and Mr. Suárez is moving the once-slumberous institute from the Ministry of Information to his own office, where it can keep him abreast of that great uncertainty: What do the Spanish people want?

The richer of Spain's 200-odd political parties are also getting into polling, and companies are forming, subdividing and regrouping like amoebas to meet the new demand. Spain now has half a dozen polling organizations and about 15 companies doing market research.

The pollsters are the first to warn about the uncertainty of their findings, which are gobbled up by an eager and lively press and mulled over by politcians busy crafting alliances.

"Right now, the unknown is almost total—and there could be many surprises," warned Carlos Sanchez Reyes, an economist who heads an organization called Macrometrica. "We need very expensive studies that Spanish political parties cannot afford."

A nagging problem is the high percentage of people offering no opinion, usually running from 25 to 40 percent. "You have to understand," said Ernesto Culebras Fernandez, who heads a new company called Facta-Vector, "that for 40 years, the Spanish people have been encouraged not to think."

Since women, rural dwellers and the uneducated are heavily represented among the "don't-knows," there is a strong suspicion that they may constitute an instinctively conservative bloc. Also, it is not fashionable to identify oneself as a "Francoite."

"Right now, there is a rough-and-tumble struggle for this undecided 25 per cent," said Mr. Culebras Fernandez, noting the large number of political parties that are trying to capture the political center.

The pollsters agree that the civil war, though it is little more than history for most of the people, lingers in the collective consciousness as a kind of warning.

"I would say that what the people reject is violence," said Manuel Gomez Reyno, a Social Democratic politician who runs a company called Data. "This is logical in an incipient consumer society."

Mr. Diez Nicolas of the Government-operated Institute added: "The collective memory tells us that you can get very little with violence. I think in a sense we are afraid of ourselves. People want to play politics, but in such a way that everyone will not lose. Somewhere between the center and the center-left would be the great majority of the population."

With some other analysts, Mr. Diez Nicolas believes that an effectively led Social Democratic movement could preempt the center. To date the Social Democrats, who may be the most poll-conscious politicians in Spain, have not put up any well-recognized leaders.

Smithsonian Gets Printing Plates For the 1879 McGuffey Readers

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP)—Printing plates for the 1879 edition of McGuffey readers, one of the most popular series of schoolbooks ever published, have been presented to the Smithsonian Institution.

Robert E. Ewing, president of Van Nostrand Reinhold, made the presentation Thursday to Dr. Brooke Hindle, director of the Museum of History and Technology.

The presentation was made in a reconstructed classroom from Cleveland in the museum's "Nation of Nations" exhibit. Several McGuffey readers are on view near the classroom, and there is an audio tape of children reading from McGuffey and other books.

The plates were recently discovered in a recess by workmen in the American Book Company in Cincinnati, original publishers of the readers.

Millions of Americans have learned to read and spell from the McGuffey readers, first published in 1838. They have never been out of print since then.

Japan and U.S., in Reported Rift, Curtail Their Talks on Fisheries

TOKYO, Nov. 12 (UPI)—Japan and the United States cut short their talks on fisheries Friday, reportdly without reaching agreement, and decided to meet again in Washington next month.

Foreign Ministry sources said the countries remained apart on the American decision to extend fishery jurisdiction 200 miles offshore, effective March 1. The conference, third of a series, opened Monday and had been scheduled to close tomorrow.

The United States is said to have threatened to bar Japanese fishermen from the 200-mile zone unless Japan recognized it. Japan, the sources said, stated that it could not recognize the extensive jurisdiction before new international law permitting such restrictive action was agreed upon at the United Nations-sponsored Conference on the Law of the Sea.

Pay in Gold Sovereigns Skirts Tax

CROYDON, England, Nov. 13 (UPI)—The seven employees of the St. James printing company are technically among Britain's lowest-paid workers. But they could hardly be happier with their lot.

The seven are paid in gold sovereigns, and for the moment at least they are not paying any income tax.

The employees receive from one to 10 gold sovereign coins each week. Each sovereign is worth only one pound, $1.60, as legal tender, but on the open gold market it sells for between 25 and 30 pounds, or $40 to $48.

"It is all perfectly legal and it works," said Bill Chandler, 48 years old, head of the company. "I do everything perfectly legally and above board. In fact I went to the trouble of telling the Inland Revenue people what I was doing. I will carry on doing it until I am told by the Inland Revenue that what I am doing is wrong."

An Inland Revenue spokesman said that the Government would probably get its due after all.

"Tax is based not on cash income but total remuneration," the spokesman said. "Sovereigns are readily marketable and have an easily determinable cash value, so we don't foresee any difficulties."

Banking officials said that there is no limit on the number of gold sovereigns a British citizen could hold or sell.

Mr. Chandler said that he buys the sovereigns from a London dealer and puts them in the pay packets. The workers then sell them on the open gold market.

One of the employees, 27-year-old Keith Goodwin says that he is delighted with his 3 pound weekly pay.

"It's marvellous," he said. "Over the years, like everybody else, I've paid a fortune in taxes. This is one way of getting my money back."

GREEKS SEEK ENTRY TO COMMON MARKET

Athens, With Madrid and Lisbon, Challenges Group to Show It Is Not a 'Rich Man's Club'

By STEVEN V. ROBERTS
Special to The New York Times

ATHENS, Nov. 13—Last month, Greece opened negotiations to become the 10th member of the European Economic Community, a process that could take several years. A few days earlier, talks aimed at improving Turkey's ties with the Common Market collapsed.

As these incidents illustrate, the Common Market is having growing pains again. Spain and Portugal, in addition to Greece, are also likely to demand admission soon, and these poor southern countries present a host of economic and political complications.

Turkey is not yet ready to risk membership, but like many developing nations it wants better access for its farm products, freer movement for its migrant workers and larger loans for its balance of payments.

Ankara also feels threatened by the prospective entry of Athens, its traditional enemy, and broke off discussions when the community failed to improve its offer.

As a unit, the Common Market is hardly ready to shoulder these troubles. It is still trying to absorb its last three members—Britain, Ireland and Denmark—and each entry is like a new baby demanding to be fed, clothed and coddled.

Problems of Their Own

Individually, the current members have vast problems of their own. The British pound keeps slipping and the Labor Government seems shaky. Italy's austerity program has evoked protests from labor unions and indifference from the populace. The French Government is already feuding about ways to confront the leftist coalition in the next election.

The community is expanding mainly for political reasons, not economic. All three membership candidates have recently shed right-wing dictatorships and now want support for their fledgling democracies. They have challenged the Common Market members to prove that they are not simply a "rich man's club" and the community simply cannot turn them down.

Prime Minister Caramanlis has been quite frank about his motives. He wants to integrate Greece's economic and political institutions so firmly to the Common Market that other members would gain a virtual veto over domestic political adventurers here, either from the right or left.

In foreign affairs, Mr. Caramanlis is more concerned about Turkey than about the Soviet Union. Ankara also belongs to the Atlantic Alliance which has little use in such disputes, but Turkey is not likely to join the Common Market for many years. Accordingly, Athens hopes to use its membership to put pressure on Turkey over such volatile issues as Cyprus and mineral exploitation in the Aegean Sea.

Ironically, the pressure is now the other way. The common Market wants no part of the Athens-Ankara feud, and partly to satisfy the desire for harmony, Greece entered talks with Turkey this week on the Aegean dispute.

Conflict in the Society

Greece's most important motive is psychological. Since it became independent in 1830, this country has always felt a conflict between aspirations and reality. Europeans told the Greeks—and the Greeks told themselves—that they represented the fountainhead of Western culture. But in fact, modern Greece was a small and primitive corner of the Balkan Peninsula. For generations, Greeks assuaged their sense of inferiority with the "megali idea," the great dream of recapturing all lands once occupied by Greeks. Now, Mr. Caramanlis believes that his proud and emotional countrymen must turn to the West and find a new "megali idea" as members of a united Europe. In a similar way, Mr. Caramanlis wants to use the Common Market to modernize the economy here. Greece's per capita income is still half the Common Market average. Industry is backward, farms are inefficient and the bureaucracy is monstrous. Only the shock of outside competition, goes the reasoning, can force improvements.

Any new member of the Common Market would face enormous adjustments, but Greece also lacks a European mentality. Its true ancestor is not the classical age of Athens but the Byzantine age of Constantinople, and it never experienced the Western renaissance of reason. Moreover, this remains a semifeudal society, and whom one knows is far more important than what one can do. The result is that many talented young Greeks find their ambitions frustrated and more abroad.

MALAYSIA REPORTS RISE IN TRANSIT DRUG TRAFFIC

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia, Nov. 13 (Reuters)—Drug trafficking through Malasia appears to be on the increase.

The law minister, Sri Abdul Kadir Din Yusoff, is especially concerned over large seizures of drugs and the arrest of traffickers with international connections. He cited the capture of 31.5 pounds of pure heroin. worth $4.3 million.

Another cause for his concern is the delay in bringing the accused to trial under new security and drug laws that prescribe the death sentence or life imprisonment.

"There are now about 20 cases which carry such penalties, but not one of them have gone on trial in the high courts yet, although preliminary inquiries in some cases have been completed," he said.

The Minister fears that the delays, which he attributes to preliminary inquiries, may demoralize officials who worked hard to make arrests.

According to officials, such hard drugs come to Malaysia mainly from Thailand and marijuana from Sumatra.

Rhodesians Seeking Malawians Instead of Local Blacks to Work in Guerrilla Area

By MICHAEL T. KAUFMAN

SALISBURY, Rhodesia, Nov. 13—This week The Rhodesia Herald, the country's major newspaper, carried the following display advertisement:

"Aberfoyle tea estate requires many Malawians to pick tea. Pay: Men 60 cents per day. Women 50 cents per day. Children 40 cents per day. If you pick 100 kilograms you will get two dollars bonus. If you work Monday to Monday men will be paid 60 cents bonus, women will get 50 cents, children 40 cents." Sixty cents is equal to one American dollar.

Why did the ad specify Malawians when there are large numbers of unemployed black Rhodesians, an official of the tea company was asked.

"Why do California grape growers hire Mexicans?" he answered. "We've always hired Malawians."

The man at the company's offices here declined to divulge its earnings, and he would not say whether there were minimum age requirements for employment. He said he did not see what there was in the advertisement that warranted a news story.

A junior employee of the company did explain why Malawians were being sought. He said that the plantations were in the Honde Valley, an area near the Mozambique border that has been the scene of guerrilla activity. "It's pretty dicey there just now, and the company is having trouble hiring pickers," he said. "I understand they need 1,600 people for the next three months."

He added that Malawi citizens, of whom there are several thousand in the country, are regarded as good workers since they do not want to return to Malawi, where wages are even lower. Furthermore, he said, as foreigners they are less likely to be used by nationalist guerrillas, who sometimes shield themselves within Rhodesian farm settlements.

The employee said that he understood that so far only three Malawians had responded to the ad. Next week the company plans to broadcast similar advertisements on the African-language programs of the Rhodesian radio. The young employee said that in addition to the pay listed the workers receive free food and housing and that there are clinics and schools for young children. The pay being offered is twice as much as the going rates for farmer laborers in many parts of Rhodesia.

Such pay scales are not unusual in many black-ruled African countries. But in Kenya, at a large British-controlled tea plantation near Kericho in the western part of the country, the average wage paid to pickers is equivalent to about $1.50 a day, and men and women are paid equally.

WOMEN MINISTERS BACKED BY NEW LUTHERAN SYNOD

Delegates to the "inaugural assembly" of the new East Coast Synod of the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches appeared yesterday to be overwhelmingly in favor of ordaining women to the ministry.

By voting to study the controversial issue, and after listening to speaker after speaker declare himself in favor of women's ordination, the synod made its breakaway from the 2.8-million-member Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod highly visible.

The theologically conservative Missouri Synod has vigorously opposed the ordination of women, and its literal interpretation of the Bible, along with the alleged autocratic policies of its president, the Rev. Dr. J. A. O. Preus, eventually led to the formation of the moderate Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches.

The association is an umbrella group of dissident moderates. It is made up of five geographic regions, of which the East Coast Synod is one. The others are the Pacific Synod, the English Synod, the Southwest Synod and the Great Rivers Synod.

The East Coast Synod was established Friday on the opening day of its inaugural assembly. The two-day meeting was held at St. Luke's Lutheran Church, 308 West 46th Street.

Both the three-million-member Lutheran Church in America and the 2.4-million-member American Lutheran Church ordain women to the ministry.

ans Upset Over Government Proposal to Ban Fresh—but Not Frozen—Meat One Week Every Month

By ALVIN SHUSTER
Special to The New York Times

Nov. 13—Andrea Gaudini, a southeast Rome, sliced away al cutlets recently and won- what he and his customers my customers like only prime they had better be fresh, not e said. "Second, my own in- ing to go down. I still have open and my expenses contcher, like others in Rome, ly upset at Italian Govern- osals to try to force frozen talians for at least one week Giovanni Marcora, the Agri- culture Minister, said that the idea was to ban sales of fresh meat in butcher shops during the first week of every month, perhaps beginning in early 1977.

To an Italian, frozen meat has about as much appeal as poison mushrooms. But Mr. Marcora said that the plan would be essential to curtail the large imports of fresh meat consumed by the Italians and thus reduce the deficit in the balance of payments.

Eating Habits Are Changing

The controversy underscores the changing eating habits of the Italians, who are consuming more and better meat each year. There may be vegetarians somewhere in Italy but they do not appear to be numerous.

Part of the reason is that most Italians feel a day is not complete without some meat. "My children wouldn't grow if they did not have meat at least once a day," said a Roman father of two sons.

It is also a matter of status. Even the poorest of families serve meat to guests because they feel that anything else would be insulting.

"You can forget chicken," said a food expert today. "Most Italians think only of beef and veal. Chicken is regarded as poor man's food. And fish is something you eat on Friday."

Because of the Italian preference for only prime cuts, importers and growers of livestock often send the cheaper cuts to North Africa and other points south. German exporters send the Italians the prime and use the rest for such products as sausages.

Plan Is Under Fire

The Government's proposal, which has come under fire from butchers and consumer organizations, is part of the evolving austerity plan here. The Government of Prime Minister Guilio Andreotti is also trying to collect more taxes, dampen consumer demand and figure out some way to curb wages.

The meat problem is particularly acute because of the heavy cost of the imports. Ministry of Agriculture officials, noting that domestic production of beef is declining, estimated that Italy spends about $5 million a day on imports of beef and livestock.

This year, for example, officials estimate that domestic producers will provide 745,000 tons of beef and veal while Italians will consume more than 1.3 million tons. The rest has to be imported.

In pushing frozen meat, officials noted that it would be cheaper because of the subsidized stocks available in the "beef mountain" of the Common Market. They estimate that Italy could save $160 million a year on its import bill by using more frozen food.

The Italians, of course, have other ideas. Americans who shop in Rome's supermarkets, for example, are often surprised to see every counter crowded but the one displaying frozen food of all kinds.

"I know my customers," said Mr. Gaudini. "If the plan goes through, some of them would switch to chicken or pork, which we could sell fresh that week. But most of them are suspicious of frozen meat and feel that it lacks the flavor of fresh. It's the same difference as eating a fresh or frozen fish—a different taste."

Alberto Primavera, who runs a meat by butcher shop, was also bitter about the idea. He complained that his shop would be open anyway during the week when he could not sell fresh meat, but his costs would remain the same, like rent, electricity and employees' salaries.

INACTION ON LOBBYING BY KOREA IS ASSAYED

Ambassador to Korea from 1967 to 1971 and Under Secretary from 1973 to 1974, and Philip C. Habib, Ambassador to Korea from 1971 to 1974 and currently the Under Secretary, had been well informed on the Korean lobby.

Mr. Rogers, a New York lawyer now, was in Europe and his secretary said he could not be reached for comment.

Robert L. Funseth, State Department spokesman said that any charge that State Department officials had failed to curb improper acts by South Koreans in an effort to preserve the Korean troop commitment in Vietnam was "absolutely false."

"As we have stated in the past," he said, "when there was an indication of any illegal activity it was brought to the attention of the Justice Department for further investigation."

Senior State Department officials have privately acknowledged that they knew of the Korean operation but contended that "bureaucratic lethargy" precluded an investigation. A spokesman for the Department of Justice, which is currently investigating charges of bribery and illegal lobbying, had no comment. The case is before a Federal grand jury here.

Mr. Saxbe, who is Ambassador to India now, told a New York Times correspondent in New Delhi that he had never been informed that Park Tong Sun, a key South Korean operative known in the United States as Tongsun Park, was under investigation, but he said that he suspected something toward the end of his term as Attorney General.

Party Raised Questions

Mr. Saxbe said that Mr. Park, whom he had known socially for two years, gave a farewell party for him that included 100 guests from the Senate, the House and the Cabinet. "You know," Mr. Saxbe said, "anybody throwing money around like that in Washington. You wonder."

He said that he had not ordered an investigation because he had not had concrete information to go on. But Congressional documents show that the Federal Bureau of Investigation began investigating Korean Central Intelligence Agency operations in America in 1973, while Mr. Saxbe was Attorney General.

Federal officials said that the F.B.I. lacked the manpower to mount a thorough investigation until 1975, just after Mr. Saxbe left for India. Those officials said that counterintelligence units of the bureau were occupied with watching agents of adversary nations and had little time for agents of allies.

United States Government interest in Korean organizations here was aroused at least as early as 1970. The following account was pieced together from Mr. Ranard, Congressional testimony, American officials and former Korean diplomats.

The State Department was suspicious of the Korean Cultural and Freedom Foundation, part of the lobby, in 1970 and asked for an audit by the Internal Revenue Service. The Revenue Service, however, found that the foundation could retain its tax-exempt status.

Report on Korea Meeting

In 1971, American intelligence reports were circulated to the Defense Department, the State Department and the National Security Council staff with information about a high-level meeting in President Park's office to plan the strategy to influence the American Congress. Mr. Rogers learned of the Korean lobby when Carl Albert, the Speaker of the House, called the State Department in 1971 to suggest that Park Tong Sun accompany a Congressional delegation to Seoul. Mr. Ranard advised that Mr. Park be excluded because of his questionable activities in Washington.

The State Department that year also learned that Mr. Park had offered Representative William S. Broomfield, Republican of Michigan, a contribution of $1,000. That same year, the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Johnson, asked the Justice Department to investigate Radio Free Asia, a subsidiary of the Korean Cultural and Freedom Foundation.

The next year, Justice Department investigators came across a financial connection between Park Tong Sun and Representative Cornelius E. Gallagher, Democrat of New Jersey, in an investigation of Mr. Gallagher.

In 1973 there was a pickup in American awareness of Korean actions. Ambassador Habib told the embassy staff in Seoul that Park Tong Sun was associated with the Korean C.I.A. and told the Agency for International Development that Mr. Park was getting money from American rice growers.

Koreans in U.S. Harassed

The State Department informed the Justice Department that K.C.I.A. agents were harassing Korean residents of the United States. The F.B.I. investigated and confirmed that report and the State Department warned the Korean Embassy that the harassment must cease.

A Korean diplomat, Lee Jai Hyon, took political asylum here in June 1973. In August, he was questioned by the F.B.I. for the first of several interviews that went on for a year. He said he had told them much about K.C.I.A. operations here.

In 1974, a White House official reported to the State Department two efforts by South Korean officials to give money, once to him and another time to Congressional candidates the Nixon Administration endorsed.

In April, 1975, the F.B.I. stepped up its investigation when James Howe, the husband of Betty Ford's personal secretary, committed suicide after allegedly accepting a vacation trip arranged by Park Tong Sun.

In June that year, Lee Jai Hyon also testified publicly before a House subcommittee on K.C.I.A. efforts to gain the support of American Congressmen. The subcommittee chairman, Representative Donald M. Fraser, Democrat of Minnesota, wrote a stream of letters to the Justice Department that apparently spurred the investigation.

More evidence was presented to Representative Fraser's subcommittee in March this year. By June, the F.B.I. and the Justice Department had enough evidence to present the case to the grand jury.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP)—Park Tong Sun made a previously undisclosed contribution of $500 to the 1970 reelection campaign of Representative John Brademas, Democrat of Indiana, a Congressional unit reported today.

ident Park Ousts South Korean C.I.A. Official Reportedly in Charge of Operations in Washington

JAMES P. STERBA

uth Korea, Sunday, Nov. 14— rk Chung Hee has secretly hird-ranking official of the ral Intelligence Agency. The reportedly responsible for the activities of a network in Washington, including un, a businessman known d States as Tongsun Park, H, a key official in the Rev. Moon's Unification Church. al three days ago represent- solid indication from Seoul vo men to a network of Korean operatives in Washington under the control of the K.C.I.A.

Well-placed Korean politicians identified the ousted intelligence official as Yang Doo Won, who was also known as Lee Sang Ho. They said he was responsible for reporting to President Park on the lobbying effort by both Mr. Moon and Park Tong Sun.

Mr. Yang, or Mr. Lee, represented the intelligence agency in Washington in the late 1960's and early 1970's as the number three man in the South Korean Embassy. Although he was ranked under the ambassador and first secretary there, he is said to have had more power than his superiors and to have communicated with Seoul outside of normal embassy channels.

Although Korean Government officials would not confirm the report of his ouster—or resignation, as some ruling party members called it—the action was known to a tight circle of politicians here. They said that when and if the action was made public here, the dismissal of Mr. Yang, or Lee, would be attributed to allegations that his wife used diplomatic pouches to carry cosmetics to her in Seoul.

Criticism of Reports

These sources said that the real reason the K.C.I.A. official was ousted was that he had failed to alert President Park to the dangers of overexposure of the lobbying activities of Mr. Moon's group and of Park Tong Sun. The official, instead, was said to have regularly presented optimistic reports to his superiors, which were transmitted to the Korean President, without warnings of the possible reactions.

Mr. Yang was a powerful official. He was reported to have been in charge of the abduction of some 40 Koreans from West Germany a few years ago. He was also reported to be the top South Korea operative in the United States during his tour there.

Sources here said his network of contacts in the United States included both paid full-time agents and part-time operatives. They said they did not know whether Park Tong Sun or Pak Bo Hi were full-time agents, but they said that both men had contact with Mr. Yang.

It is not clear here whether President Park was informed directly of Mr. Yang's operation. Government officials have repeatedly denied that Park Tong Sun and Pak Bo Hi met with the President in the early 1970's to map out a program of influencing American Congressmen. Several Congressmen have conceded that they received cash payments from Park Tong Sun.

Some politicians here contend that Park Tong Sun and other Koreans in Washington simply overdid lobbying activities after receiving informal guidance from South Korean officials. They say that President Park was not made fully aware of these activities through trusted K.C.I.A. channels because Mr. Yang was presenting only favorable reports.

Warnings that the lobbying activities of Mr. Moon's group, of Park Tong Sun and of other operatives were getting out of hand were said to have been dispatched through normal diplomatic channels. But some sources here say they were screened before reaching President Park.

Medical Schools Fighting Pressure To Admit Americans From Abroad

By GENE MAEROFF

Special to The New York Times

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 13—A storm of protest is gathering at medical schools around the country in reaction to a new law under which certain Federal funds would be withheld from institutions that failed to accept as transfer students Americans who have studied abroad.

The requirement, a hitherto obscure provision in the Health Professions Educational Assistance Act signed into law last month, will apparently be the focus of a major test of Washington's expanding power over higher education in the United States. Related to that issue is the sensitive question of whether applicants initially rejected by American medical schools should get a second chance merely because they could afford to embark upon their studies at costly foreign institutions.

At stake in the confrontation are tens of millions of dollars in capitation funds and guaranteed student loans that the law says will be forfeited by medical colleges that do not agree to go along with the controversial plan. These capitation funds, given by the Government, can be spent at the discretion of the medical schools. The amount given depends on the school's enrollment.

"This legislation makes the Secretary of Health Education and Welfare the admissions director for the medical schools of this country," said Dr. Julius R. Krevans, dean of the medical school of the University of California at San Francisco.

Medical educators, meeting here for the annual meeting of the Association of American Medical Colleges, are rallying behind a growing list of institutions that say they may give up Federal aid rather than comply with the law.

Yesterday, at a session attended by the deans of three-quarters of the country's 116 medical schools, unanimous approval was given to a resolution deploring "the intrusion into the academic perogatives of the university" that the new law represents.

The resolution was introduced by Dr. Robert W. Berliner, the medical dean of Yale University, which this week became the first institution to declare that it would turn down its Federal funds if the controversial item were not taken out of the health manpower bill.

Now, the medical deans at Indiana University, which has the nation's largest medical school, and Stanford University have recommended that their institutions, too, risk losing Federal assistance rather than yield to the provision.

Dr. Clayton Rich, the Stanford medical dean, stated in a letter to his faculty and students that Stanford may have to forfeit as much as $792,000 in capitation funds if the fully authorized amount of money is appropriated.

Spokesmen at Harvard University, St. Louis University, the University of North Carolina, Northwestern University and several other institutions have also expressed their concern. These institutions are weighing their courses of action.

"The health manpower bill is a generally sound piece of legislation that we have waited three years to get," said Dr. Christopher Fordham 3d, medical dean at North Carolina.

"But I find this provision on students from abroad philosophically objectionable," Dr. Fordham continued. "It selects a particular group of students who were not admitted through the normal process and puts them back into the system. It favors those who could afford to get around the system."

Robin Schmidt, Harvard's vice president for government and community affairs, said in a telephone interview that the situation "is very serious not so much because of the additional students involved, but from the point of view of interference with the administrative process."

Precise Rules Still Lacking

Specific regulations governing the provision have not yet been disseminated. Nor has it been announced whether the policy would go into effect in 1977 or 1978.

The legislation provides, in broad terms, that Americans already enrolled in foreign medical schools will be virtually guaranteed admission to schools in the United States after completing two years of studies and passing Part I of the National Board of Medical Examiners' test. No other aspects of their records matter.

Power is given to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to apportion among the nation's medical schools the number of places needed to absorb all the students who meet the two criteria. Some demonstrably overcrowded institutions may not have to participate in the program.

Institutions would apparently choose from the pool—using their own admissions standards—the number of students required to meet their quotas, but it is unclear how the Federal Government would place the students no school selects.

Until now, without benefit of special legislation, hundreds of Americans have been able on their own to transfer into American medical schools after completing at least two years in foreign institutions.

Rating of Passing Compared

Figures provided by the Association of American Colleges show that last year 864 such students took Part 1 of the National Board test. There were 377 who passed and 271 were accepted by American medical schools.

Their passing rate was 56 percent, while the comparable rate for students who spend their first two years in American medical schools was 85 percent.

Northwestern has for the last three years acceepted 12 Americans annually from foreign medical schools and none has failed.

"It has been quite successful," said Dr. James Eckenhoff, the medical dean. "But we are uncomfortable with the proposed Federal program because we may no longer be able to follow our own guidelines and take the better students that we have chosen in the past."

Churches Found Still Largely Segregated

By KENNETH A. BRIGGS

The congregation of President-elect Jimmy Carter's church in Plains, Ga., is expected to reconsider today its explicit ban on black members, a policy that was once widespread among white churches but that has largely gone the way of the segregated lunch counter.

Pressures from inside and outside religious groups, reflecting changing legal, social and ethical attitudes, have ended prohibitions against black members except in isolated churches, most of them in rural areas, according to a broad range of Roman Catholic and Protestant observers.

A check of several major cities by The New York Times disclosed no formal racial restrictions.

'The Most Segregated Hour'

Yet, with few exceptions, the church hour on Sunday morning still fits the late Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s description as "the most segregated hour of the week."

Among the reasons for the pervasive segregation are a continuing hostility toward blacks among whites, a growing pride in the black church and black theology, and cultural, economic and geographical factors that separate blacks and whites in the broader sense.

"Many churches nominally opened their doors," said Dr. C. Eric Lincoln, sociologist of religion at Duke University, "but there was no rush among blacks to get in and there was no red carpet, either."

The 1960's, says Dr. W. Sterling Cary, former president of the National Council of Churches, were largely devoted to achieving "symbolic victories" over the starkest forms of segregation. Sit-ins and pray-ins were common strategies, with blacks and whites, clergy and laity, joining forces to open up churches. Many of the more liberal Protestant groups appointed blacks to visible and responsible roles.

Underlying Problems Ignored

But, in the view of Dr. Cary, now an executive of the United Church of Christ in Illinois, the underlying problems that contribute to racism—such things as economic injustice—are still generally ignored by the churches. The black-white coalition that carried out projects in the 60's broke up as soon as the movement came to the North, according to Dr. Cary and other leaders.

Meanwhile, many local churches continue to act as though their parent organizations had not urged an end to bias, and some of those large organizations themselves—among them, the Protestant evangelicals, who number about 40 million—are still concerned with the most elementary breakthroughs.

For example, when plans were made for a joint worship service between the four black Baptist conventions in Alabama and their white Southern Baptist counterpart at the Alabama Baptist State Convention, the event was given great prominence in the state's white-controlled Baptist newspaper.

Stirrings of concern for broader racial problems are evident among such small groups as the three-year-old Evangelicals for Social Action. At its annual meeting last month, the subject was racism, and one focus was the Christian college. But one socially concerned member acknowledges that "racism is yet to be considered a prime sin" among most evangelicals.

Whether churches are better or worse than other institutions on the racial issue is a matter of opinion and the circumstances of the person doing the evaluating.

Not Subject to Legal Pressure

Unlike most public institutions, churches are not subject to the civil rights laws that have been used to put pressure on schools, businesses and government agencies to accept a racial mix.

"The difference is that the church can operate on its own," said the Rev. Weldon Gaddy, director of Christian Citizen Development for the Southern Baptist Convention. "If we took away all equal employment regulations and agency guidelines, we'd see better where we stood. I'm not so sure the church is that far behind."

The Rev. Lucius Walker of the National Council of Churches adds, "If you take the private social club like Kiwanis or Rotary, I would guess that the church would come out better."

Nevertheless, the church, because of its preachments on biblical justice, tends to be judged by higher standards.

There are few churches in the nation that have self-consciously tried to create mixed congregations. While most congregations are committed to equality, says the Rev. Eugene Callender, a Presbyterian minister from New York, "when the congregation begins to take on a different racial character, the whites leave."

For the most part, church membership patterns closely mirror neighborhood demographics. In changing or "transition" areas, churches may remain mixed until the area begins to "tip" toward a black majority.

For example, the Rev. Paul Foust, a Michigan official of the Missouri Synod of the Lutheran Church, accepted the first black member of the Greenfield Peace Lutheran in upper-middle-class northwest Detroit 15 years ago. At the church's recent 90th anniversary service, 75 percent of the congregation was black. During the same 15 years, the neighborhood has changed from predominantly white to 80 percent black.

Dr. Lincoln notes that no more than 1 percent of black Christians belong to white churches, and adds, "I'll know the millenium has come when whites begin going to black churches."

The United Methodist Church has a 3 percent black constituency, the highest percentage of any traditional major Protestant sect. There are a million black Roman Catholics, that figure has held steady in the last few years, and an estimated 10,000 blacks among the 12.7 million Southern Baptists.

Black Religion Gaining Respect

Many black Christians regard white churches as spiritually bankrupt. In addition, black leaders say that black religion is gaining respect among certain middle-class people who might once have been embarrassed by its emotional tone and style.

The development of black theology, which provides a thoughtful and creative foundation for the church and extends the "black is beautiful" motif to religion, has also been a cohesive force.

Some whites, for a variety of reasons, look upon the special character and affinity among black Christians as evidence that integration is an untenable, and even unworthy, goal.

A white deacon of the 3,000-member First Baptist Church of New Orleans, which has a handful of black members, speculated that blacks disliked white worship because "it's too stodgy for them; they are much more exuberant, more outwardly expressive."

Some Notable Exceptions

While de facto segregation is the rule, here are notable exceptions, churches or groups that have taken the initiative in creating a mixed constituency.

Among them is the Riverside Church in New York, a third of whose 2,500 members are black, and Glide Memorial Church in San Francisco, a Methodist institution with a large white membership and a black pastor. Both churches have a history of commitment to racial justice.

A somewhat different example exists a few miles down the road from Mr. Carter's church, the Plains Baptist Church. It is Koinonia Farm, founded in the 1940's by the late Rev. Dr. Clarence Jordan as a communal experiment in racial and economic equality.

Dr. Jordan, who left a professorship in ethics at a Southern Baptist Convention Seminary to start the project, guided the community through years of harrassment by local opponents. As a sign of the shifting tide of attitudes, perhaps, the Koinonia is now generally accepted, while the policies of racial exclusion at the Plains Baptist Church raise a fuss.

2 Teaneck Churches Show Mixed Results In Appeal to Blacks

By ROBERT HANLEY

Special to The New York Times

TEANECK, N.J., Nov. 13—Joe Walker, the black playwright, and a black drama company he has organized have recently been rehearsing his new play, "The Lion Is a Soul Brother," at the Presbyterian Church of Teaneck in this integrated suburb of New York. On other days, the church's auditorium is used for the practice sessions of Bergenstage, a part-time, all-white theater group whose members live throughout surrounding Bergen County.

The welcome for each organization is one facet of the church's religious and sociological campaign to strengthen the vitality of a fully integrated congregation and broaden its appeal to both blacks and whites who live here and in nearby communities.

The Rev. Robert J. Chase, a 28-year-old Presbyterian minister, says this attitude has helped mold a 350-member congregation that is 55 percent white and 45 percent black, roughly equal to the racial composition of the neighborhood it serves.

In contrast, St. Paul's Lutheran Church, which is a block away from the Presbyterian Church, has a 400-member congregation that is 90 percent white and 10 percent black.

Some Similar Characteristics

Despite those differences, the two Protestant churches have some similarities. Both are attractive brick structures set amid the homes of quiet residential streets. Both have long standing in the community—St. Paul's was established 50 years ago, the Presbyterian Church, 75. And membership in both has dropped in recent years—St. Paul's by two-thirds and the Presbyterian Church by about one-half.

Yet, while Mr. Chase speaks of working in a "diverse, exciting" neighborhood since coming to the Presbyterian Church nearly a year ago, the Rev. George DeLawter, who has been at St. Paul's for 25 years, acknowledges difficulties in encouraging black membership, not so much with children as with adults.

Black youngsters through their early teens do go to the Lutheran church, primarily because of encouragement from their white friends in the neighborhood, Pastor DeLawter said. But he added that his experience in the last few years was that young blacks seldom remained faithful to the church once they reached the sophomore or junior year in high school.

At that age, he said, the young blacks tend to become aware of racial pride and identity. Instead of joining St. Paul's, blacks tend to worship in black churches in New York City or in Englewood, which is adjacent to Teaneck.

"We've always been welcomed and have no trouble [at their homes]," Pastor DeLawter said. "But a black looks at a white and sees a white skin and he wants to identify with his own."

Mr. Chase did not dispute Pastor DeLawter's perceptions about black identity as a drawback to membership in a white church, but at the Presbyterian Church, he said, "the black experience will be respected and allowed to be heard."

Toward that end, he added, his church welcomed Mr. Walker and his young actors, formed an all-black gospel choir, helped members with housing, recreational and welfare problems, and recruited a young black seminarian from the Princeton Seminary to help organize recreation for teen-agers.

All 11 in Cabinet Starting to Make Post-Ford Plans

By MARJORIE HUNTER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13—They got their "to be laid off" notices in the chill hours before dawn on Nov. 3. But unlike millions of other Americans, they are not likely to swell the unemployment lines this winter.

They are the members of President Ford's Cabinet.

Some plan to go back to their old jobs. Some plan extended vacations. And some just are not saying what they will do when their Government jobs officially end with the inauguration of Jimmy Carter on Jan. 20.

For at least two members of the Cabinet, William E. Simon and Thomas S. Kleppe, there is no financial pressure to find new employment. Treasury Secretary Simon and Interior Secretary Kleppe are millionaires.

But even the wealthy among the 11 Cabinet members—the 10 men and one woman who head departments of the Government—are expected to remain in the job market, in one capacity or another.

Main Focus on Kissinger

Most of the speculation, at least at intimate Washington dinner parties and along the corridors of Government buildings, has centered on what the most celebrated member of the Cabinet, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger, will do when the Democrats take office.

Mr. Kissinger has said, jestingly, "I'm being considered for chief of protocol."

On another occasion, he jokingly told one reporter, "I'm looking into a job with the C.A.B.," a reference to the Civil Aeronautics Board.

While Mr. Kissinger, who is 53 years old, has firmly declined to say seriously what he plans to do, friends are convinced he will probably accept one of several lucrative offers (reportedly of $1 million to $2 million) to write his memoirs.

Mr. Kissinger is also known to have expressed interest in establishing some "special relationship" with Harvard University that would allow him to return there in a part-time capacity other than that of ordinary professor. He was professor of government there before joining the Nixon Administration in 1969.

Close friends expect Mr. Kissinger and his wife, Nancy, to remain in Washington at least until next summer.

Treasury Secretary Simon, 48, has indicated some interest in returning to the private financial community, perhaps even to Salomon Brothers, the Wall Street investment banking concern in which he was a partner before coming to Washington in 1972.

He gave some hint of this recently in a speech in New York City when he said, partly in jest, that if Mayor Beame would allow him back into that city, he might be interested in going back to work there.

A year ago, Mr. Simon angered New York City officials when he demanded stringent economic reforms as a condition for supporting New York City in its financial crisis.

Mr. Simon also has not ruled out a bid for political office in New Jersey, although he has said he would not run for Governor there next year. The Simons own homes in Morristown, N. J., in the Washington, D. C., suburbs and a recently purchased home in East Hampton.

Attorney General Edward H. Levi, at 65 the oldest of the Ford Cabinet, may return to the University of Chicago Law School. He was president of the university when named Attorney General in February 1975 and is on leave as a law professor.

Before then, however, Mr. Levi plans to vacation in Europe and later take a boat trip on the Nile with a group from Chicago.

Secretary of Commerce Elliot L. Richardson, 56, has no immediate plans for after he leaves office but is expected to remain in the Washington area.

Politics Could Draw Richardson

Friends say that Mr. Richardson has not ruled out political office in his native Massachusetts. Some have encouraged him to run for Governor there in 1978.

Mr. Richardson, who is sometimes called "the Man for All Positions," served the Nixon Administration as Under Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and then Attorney General before resigning in what has become known as the Saturday Night Massacre involving the dismissal of Archibald Cox, the Watergate special prosecutor.

Later, Mr. Richardson was named by President Ford as Ambassador to Britain and then as Commerce Secretary.

Unlike Mr. Kissinger, Mr. Richardson is not being pursued by book publishers for his memoirs. His book was published last year.

Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, 44, has not indicated what he plans to do. A one-time Chicago investment banker, he has been in and out of Washington since his election to the House in 1962, and friends believe he will remain here, at least for some months.

Some believe that Mr. Rumsfeld might eventually return to Illinois and run for public office, perhaps the Senate. He is also believed to have Presidential ambitions four years hence.

Two members of the Cabinet, John A. Knebel and F. David Mathews, have decided on their futures. Mr Mathews, 40, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, will return to his old job as president of the University of Alabama. Mr. Knebel, also 40, the interim Secretary of Agriculture, plans to resume private law practice in Washington.

Secretary of the Interior Thomas S. Kleppe, 57, a one-time investment banker from North Dakota, is likely to remain either in the Washington area or somewhere along the East Coast. He is a millionaire and trains harness horses as a hobby.

May Return to Law Practice

Carla A. Hills, 42, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, has not disclosed her plans. She and her husband, Roderick M. Hills, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, may return to private law practice.

William T. Coleman Jr., 56, Secretary of Transportation, has said he feels it would be improper to discuss his plans until he leaves office. He was a member of a law firm in Philadelphia before coming to Washington.

ON B-1 DECISION D BY PENTAGON

up again later, the Air Force st enter into a contract for tion of the bomber by the nth.

t two weeks, the Defense uisition Review Committee, top research, procurement y officials of the Pentagon, is scheduled to meet to determine whether to recommend that the bomber be produced. Within the Pentagon it is regarded as a foregone conclusion that production will be recommended and that this recommendation will be adopted by Donald H. Rumsfeld as one of his final important acts as Secretary of Defense.

The second deadline of Feb. 1 was imposed by Congressional Democrats, ostensibly to put over the production decision to a new administration, which they presumed would be Democratic. But the way the compromise was worked out in this year's defense appropriations bill, the legislative language did not exactly have the effect of postponing a production decision.

The defense appropriations bill contains nearly $1 billion for production of the first three B-1 bombers with an option to build five more. Eventually the Air Force plans to build 244 of the bombers, at an estimated cost of $24 billion.

The Senate originally voted that none of the production money could be used until Feb. 1. In the Senate-House conference, however, that prohibition was modified in a way acceptable to the Air Force.

Legal Production Contract

The compromise specified that until Feb. 1 the production money could be obligated at a monthly rate of $87 million, which was the rate at which the Air Force had planned to spend the money anyway, and that a long-term commitment of the rest of the production funds could not be made until after Feb. 1.

Legally, under this compromise, the Air Force could enter into a production contract with Rockwell International on Dec. 1, spending enough money to get production going, with the commitment that the bulk of the production funds would be made available after Feb. 1.

As a high-ranking Air Force official acknowledged, however, such a course would present Mr. Carter with "a tombstone deal" that would tend to "box him in" as he takes office.

Within two weeks after taking office, Mr. Carter would have to make a decision on whether there should be a long-term commitment to production of the B-1 bomber. He would also be thrust into an immediate test of his power and support in Congress.

Under the new budget act, if Mr. Carter chose to terminate the production contract and impound the production funds, he would have to obtain Congressional approval. By substantial margins, both the House and Senate this year refused to terminate the B-1 program, and it is not certain that Congress would approve a Carter decision to stop production.

It is uncertain to the Air Force whether Mr. Carter will eventually approve production of the bomber, but at the very least, as officials made clear, it does not want to alienate the new President by seeming to impose a decision upon him.

Mr. Carter has been critical but still somewhat ambiguous about the B-1 bomber. In a statement to the Democratic Platform Committee before he won the nomination, Mr. Carter described the bomber as "an example of a proposed system which should not be funded and would be wasteful of taxpayers' dollars." At other times he said he favored continued development of the bomber but was opposed to immediate production.

"We have to work with the new administration, and it is not in our interest to have a tombstone victory," an Air Force general observed. "We want to keep the program going in the sense of a commitment to production but still in a way that allows the new President plenty of time to make up his mind."

House Unit Will Get Memo Telling Of Oswald's Plan to Kill Kennedy

By NICHOLAS M. HORROCK
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 — A 1964 memorandum saying that Lee Harvey Oswald told Cuban officials he was going to kill President Kennedy more than a month before the assassination is part of a packet of new material found in Government files that will be turned over to a special Congressional investigating committee, reliable Government sources said today.

Edward H. Levi, the attorney general, has imposed a curtain of extraordinary secrecy over the search of Department of Justice and Federal Bureau of Investigation files in connection with the assassination inquiry.

The file search was begun at the request of the House Select Committee on Assassinations formed earlier this year to re-investigate the deaths of President Kennedy and of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., the civil rights leader.

First Meeting To Be Held Monday

The committee will hold its first formal meeting on Monday. Its chief counsel, Richard A. Sprague, is expected to recommend that a staff of 170 lawyers and trained homicide detectives conduct the two investigations.

The committee was formed after a subcommittee of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence reported earlier this year that it had discovered evidence that raised serious questions about whether the commission, headed by the late Chief Justice Earl Warren, that investigated Mr. Kennedy's death received full and complete information from the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the Central Intelligence Agency.

The newly discovered memorandum was prepared in 1964, well after Mr. Kennedy was killed. It was prepared for J. Edgar Hoover, then the director of the F.B.I. One usually reliable source said it was prepared to be "sent" to the Warren Commission. Another source, however, said it may not have been intended as a formal memorandum to the commission but rather as "some other kind of informal contact."

In substance the memorandum states that the F.B.I. Director had learned from a reliable informant that Lee Harvey Oswald had told Cuban officials more than a month before Mr. Kennedy's assassination that he planned to kill the American President.

Evidence of Cuban Backing

The informant, according to the memorandum, said that he had learned of Mr. Oswald's plan from Fidel Castro, the Cuban Premier. If this were true, it would be the strongest evidence yet found that Mr. Oswald had had Cuban backing in his assassination attempt.

A senior F.B.I. official said privately that there was "no implication whatsoever" from the newly discovered memorandum that Mr. Hoover knew about the assassination before it happened. The memorandum refers to information obtained by the F.B.I. during the investigation in 1964.

David W. Belin, a member of the Warren Commission staff and later director of the staff that investigated the Central Intelligence Agency for the Ford Administration, said that "to his knowledge" the Warren Commission had never received a document from the F.B.I. with so explicit a piece of information based upon a "reliable informant."

Source in Cuban Government

John A. McCone, who was director of the C.I.A. during the Kennedy Administration, has been quoted in news accounts as saying that he never knew of such information.

The C.I.A. had developed a source within the top levels of the Cuban Government in 1961 whom it had dubbed AMLASH and who had been in frequent close contact with Premier Castro.

'ACES FIGHT RGANIZATION

Members Expected to solidation Aimed at ning Operations

ARD L. MADDEN
The New York Times

I, Nov. 13—When the Jan. 4, it may be facing truggle over a proposal to make the most sweeping changes in the Senate committee structure in 30 years.

The reorganization, which was drafted by a bipartisan Senate committee last September just before the Congressional adjournment, has the support of a number of younger senators who want to make the operations of the Senate more efficient.

But the plan is expected to encounter opposition from some of the more senior senators who could lose chairmanships or jurisdiction, although the only opposition that has emerged so far has come from some groups representing veterans and the aged who do not want to abolish the existing committees that deal with their problems.

Proponents of the reorganization believe that the climate is right in the Senate to make at least some of the proposed changes and the restructuring would be compatible with most any reorganization of the executive branch that President-elect Jimmy Carter may propose.

A Six-Month Study

"We've never kidded ourselves that it wouldn't be tough," said Kenneth E. Gray, staff director of the Select Committee on Committees, which made a six-month study of the Senate committee system before recommending changes. But he added that many senators seemed "almost desperate to get things under control."

The plan would reduce the number of Senate committees to 15 from the current 31 and would limit a Senator's committee and subcommittee assignments to eight. At present Senators serve on an average of 18 committees and subcommittees and some hold 30 or more assignments. In addition, the current 176 Senate subcommittees would be reduced to about 100.

The proposal, which would amount to the most drastic overhaul of the Senate committee structure since 1946, would create new committees on energy and the environment and would consolidate jurisdiction in other areas such as transportation, human resources, science and technology and international economics.

The plan has not yet been considered by the Senate Rules Committee, which handles housekeeping matters for the Senate. But Senator Adlai E. Stevenson, 3d, the Illinois Democrat who was chairman of the committee study, is planning to try to get immediate consideration of the proposal when the Senate convenes, according to his aides.

Proponents Are Determined

If necessary, the aides said, proponents of the reorganization will try to block all committee assignments unless the Senate gets a chance to consider the proposal.

Prospects for securing approval of the proposal may have been set back by the defeat Nov. 2 of Senator Bill Brock, a Tennessee Republican who was vice chairman of the study committee. However, Mr. Brock has said that he will work for approval of the plan even though he will not be in the Senate in January.

In addition, three Democratic chairmen of committees that would be abolished under the consolidation were defeated on Nov. 2, which may reduce opposition to the plan. They were Senators Frank E. Moss of Utah, chairman of the Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committees; Gale W. McGee of Wyoming, chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, and Vance Hartke of Indiana, chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee.

Under the proposal, there would be the following 14 standing committees of the Senate: Agriculture and Small Business; Appropriations; Armed Services; Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs; Budget; Commerce, Science and Transportation; Energy and Natural Resources; Environment and Public Works; Finance; Foreign Relations; Government Affairs; Human Resources; Judiciary; and Rules, Administration and Standards. In addition, the newly-created Intelligence Committee would be continued at least for the next Congress.

DRIVE ON TO REVISE NEW CAMPAIGN LAW

Congressmen, Assessing Results in Election, Hope to Deal With Energy Problems

By WARREN WEAVER Jr.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13—A major drive to revise the new Federal campaign law, liberalizing its financial restrictions and promoting more spontaneous local political activity, is already under way in Congress.

There is little or no disposition on Capitol Hill to alter the basic reforms that governed the 1976 election for the first time: Federal subsidies for Presidential candidates in both primary and general election campaigns, limits on the size of contributions and spending and full disclosure of all activity.

In fact, one group of Congressional activists wants to expand the subsidy concept, tied to spending limits, to cover all Senate and House candidates beginning in 1978, on the theory that public financing demonstrably frees elected officials from any obligation to special interest groups or wealthy individuals who have financed their campaigns in the past.

Problems During Election

Beyond that controversial proposal, politicians all over Washington are discussing changes in the campaign law aimed at eliminating problems that cropped up during its first application.

Representative Morris K. Udall of Arizona, who dealt with the law firsthand as an unsuccessful Democratic Presidential candidate, has taken the lead in assembling what he calls "a small representative bipartisan House-Senate coalition that can move early in 1977" toward new political legislation.

So far, a letter Mr. Udall circulated the day after the election has won pledges of support from three Democratic Senators—Birch Bayh of Indiana, George S. McGovern of South Dakota and Alan Cranston — and two Representatives — John B. Anderson, Republican of Illinois, and Timony E. Wirth, Democrat of Colorado.

Changes Being Contemplated

Setting aside the touchy question of Congressional campaign subsidies, political authorities are contemplating these changes in the new regulatory system:

¶Increasing the subsidized spending limit for the two major party Presidential candidates in the general election from $21.8 million, the figure this year, by a minimum of $5 million and, perhaps to a level as high as $30 or $35 million.

¶Increasing the maximum campaign contribution an individual can give a Presidential candidate from $1,000 to as high as $5,000. Some politicians want to raise this figure for Senate and House candidates as well, others believe it should remain at $1,000 for these far less expensive races.

¶Permitting state and local party units to spend a limited amount of money in support of the national ticket without its constituting an illegal contribution. Such money would go for billboards, brochures, buttons and bumper stickers, often tying state and local candidates to the national nominees.

¶Providing some form of Federal subsidy for independent and minority party Presidential candidates in the general election. The present law provides for retroactive payment to any of them who receive 5 percent of the national vote or more—none did last week—but then only to cover campaign debts.

¶Revising the enforcement powers of the Federal Election Commission to make the agency more responsive to complaints of illegal campaign practices filed in the weeks before the election.

Proposals by Udall

In his letter to prospective members of his coalition, Representative Udall stressed public financing of Senate and House elections, reimposition of spending limits for those races that were stricken by the Supreme Court, reducing the maximum legal contribution by a political committee to a candidate from $5,000 to $2,500 and more limits on the political use of the Congressional free mailing privilege.

There is considerable sentiment for restricting the amount of his or her own money that a Senate or House candidate can spend on a political campaign, but most authorities are agreed that there is no procedure available that is both Constitutional and practical.

The Supreme Court has made it clear that campaign spending limits can only be imposed as a condition of receiving political subsidies, and candidates always have the option of refusing subsidies and relying on private contributions instead.

Thus, the only way of bringing a wealthy candidate like Senator-elect H. John Heinz 3d of Pennsylvania within a spending ceiling is to offer a subsidy as high as the amount of personal wealth he is willing to invest in his election. This would mean large-state Senate subsidies of $2 million or more, clearly a prohibitive figure.

More Difficult Problems

While Federal subsidies for the Presidential election appear to have won general public support, extension of such a system to Senate and House candidates presents many more difficult problems.

In last week's House election, more than 95 percent of the sitting members who sought re-election won. If all challengers for House seats were subjected to a spending ceiling, as they would be —except for the wealthy—under almost any subsidy plan, it would probably become even harder to unseat an incumbent with his built-in advantages of publicity and experience than it is now.

The Democratic platform adopted in Madison Square Garden last July calls for "partial public financing on a matching basis of the Congressional elections," but some thoughtful party officials wonder whether such legislation might not have the effect of freezing Democratic Congressional majorities and thus arousing wide public protest.

Officials of both parties are interested in changes in the law that would permit more volunteer activity at the local level and a broader involvement of ordinary people in the Presidential election.

One Republican legal adviser deplored the absence of party fund-raising events, drawing people into participation, that resulted from a Presidential election supported almost in its entirety by Federal subsidy. A Democratic counterpart suggested that party members should be permitted to give more of their time and money without an accountable political contribution being created.

BURIAL OF PESTICIDE AT ISSUE IN IDAHO

Allied Chemical Wants to Entomb Tons of Toxic Kepone in Unused Missile Silos South of Boise

Special to The New York Times

BOISE,Idah o, Nov. 13—The Idaho authorities are pondering whether to allow the Allied Chemical Company to bury tons of Kepone wastes, now in Baltimore. in anaba ndoned Titan missile silo 2,000 miles away in this state.

The company was fined $13 million last month for polluting the James River in Virginia with residues of the highly toxic pesticide from its subsidiary plant at Hopewell, Va., and manufacture of the product has been stopped.

Allied has some 85,000 pounds of the compound, most of which is stored in Kepone-contaminated scrap metal. Destruction of the chemical by high-temperature incineration is under trial at a research laboratory in Toledo, Ohio.

However, a company official said, there remain 5,000 pounds of Kepone mixed with arsenic, another pesticide, that cannot be burned because arsenic would be released into the air. In addition, there are 60 tons of Kepone sludge in barrels not readily burnable, and five tons of steel and other junk from dismantled manufacturing facilities.

The proposal is that all this unburnable material be entombed, theoretically forever, in one of 13 former underground missile launching cylindars near the hamlet of Grand View, 40 miles south of Boise.

Built in the 1960's on a 17-acre tract, the silos were later deactivated and sold by the Federal Government.

The Wes-Con Company, a Twin Falls disposal concern, acquired them in 1973, and has been using them for the disposal of agricultural and industrial wastes.

The silos are 160 feet deep and 50 feet in diameter, with concrete walls six feet thick and floors 13 feet thick.

Representatives of Allied Chemical and Wes-Con outlined the burial project to officials of the State Health and Welfare and Water Resources Departments at a closed meeting here yesterday that was also attended by Dr. Jack Blanchard, Kepone coordinator for the Federal Environmental Protection Agency in Washington.

The state officials took the proposal under advisement. A final decision may be up to Gov. Cecil D. Andrus, who was away this weekend. An aide, John Hough, said the Governor was "aware of the proposal but not actively involved" at this time.

There have been suggestions from some people aware of the proposal that eventually the silo inevitably would deteriorate, possibly releasing the Kepone, which keeps its strength a long time. However, Gene Rinebold, president of Wes-Con, said the deposit would be crushed into virtually a solid mass by a concrete-like "encapsulation" of clay and lime.

The Health and Welfare Department's solid waste director, N. Ed Barker, said the silos were far above any water table, and had been designed to resist even the shock of an atomic bomb.

The site is 10 miles west of Grand View, which has 260 residents.

Fewer Cavities Are Hinted In Ancient Peru Indians Than Among Modern Man

RICHMOND (UPI)—Ancient Peruvian Indians probably never used toothbrushes, but they had fewer cavities than modern man and surprisingly fewer instances of cleft palate, a Virginia dentist has found.

Dr. Dan R. Sawyer, an oral pathologist at Medical College of Virginia School of Dentistry, drew his conclusions after participating in a study of more than 5,000 mummies from six South American Indian Cultures flourishing between 600 B.C. and 1700 A.D.

Dr. Sawyer's scientific research team found no trace of cleft palate, a finding he says suggests that such birth defects may have been much rarer in ancient times than they are today.

He said that cleft palate, which occurs in one of 800 persons in the present day United States and more frequently in South America, could be a trait introduced to the area by the influx of Europeans or may now be more common because of environmental changes.

Anthropologists, who have found cleft palates depicted in art works of the period, say the problem may have been relatively common in pre-Columbian times, but Dr. Sawyer disagrees.

He said that the art works may really depict some form of ornamentation, or that cleft palate may have been so rare and curious to the ancients that they preserved the phenomena in ceramics.

The dentist said that studies on human specimens from ancient times help scientists to understnad the natural course of diseases, since in modern man most diseases are arrested with treatment.

Dr. Sawyer said he found none of the cultures he studies around Ica, Peru, tried to treat cavities and other disorders directly. Instead, he said, they relieved toothache pain with herbs, especially by chewing coca leaves, which contain cocaine, and other plants, which contain the chemicals in aspirin.

In the earliest cultures, said Dr. Sawyer, teeth were relatively free of decay, perhaps because coarse food—often containing desert sand—wore the teeth so smooth that food would not stick to them to initiate decay.

Turkey and Greece Report Plan To Aid Talks on Aegean Dispute

ANKARA, Turkey, Nov. 12 (Reuters)—Turkey and Greece announced Friday that they had signed a document outlining procedures for future talks regarding the exploration and exploitation of resources on the Aegean continental shelf, meaning mainly oil.

The document, signed at the end of nine days of talks in Switzerland, is to be made public next week, a Turkish Foreign Ministry spokesman said.

"The two sides reached agreement on the procedural details of future negotiations on the continental shelf dispute and a document was signed," the spokesman said.

A joint statement said the meeting had been held in a cordial and constructive atmosphere.

At two earlier meetings, in January and July this year, the two sides merely stated their views and said any solution would take "some time."

UTAH CONVICT WANTS TO WED BEFORE DEATH

Killer, Slated for Execution Soon, Seeks Marriage With Woman Who Has Visited Prison

By JON NORDHEIMER
Special to The New York Times

SALT LAKE CITY, Nov. 13—Gary Mark Gilmore, the convicted killer who had pleaded with the Utah authorities to execute him, may attempt to be married on death row before his date with the firing squad.

The young woman he wants to take as a bride is Nicole Barrett, a Provo woman about 21 years old, who reportedly has two children from previous marriages.

"I'm considering marrying Nicole," Mr. Gilmore said through his attorney, Dennis Boaz. "They've married other convicts in prison before, so I don't think they'll stand in my way."

Mrs. Barrett, whose tumultuous relationship with Mr. Gilmore broke up one week before the July spree that left two young men shot and killed in the Provo area, could not be reached for comment.

Associated Press
Nicole Barrett during a television interview on KSL-TV.

She had been visiting the prisoner regularly since his conviction, sometimes hitchhiking from her home to reach the prison about 20 miles away.

Mr. Gilmore, through his attorney, also said that rumors of a suicide pact were without foundation. There had been speculation by those close to the case that the condemned man might attempt suicide if his execution was delayed beyond next week.

He had been sentenced to die on Monday, but after a series of rulings by the Utah Supreme Court, which had cleared the way for the execution, Gov. Calvin L. Rampton sent the case to the State Pardon Board for review on Wednesday. The board has three options: It can commute the sentence to life imprisonment against Mr. Gilmore's wishes, order a review of the case, or refuse to take action and request the trial judge to set a new execution date.

If he is executed this month, it is likely that he will become the first to suffer the death penalty in the United States since 1967.

His relationship with Mrs. Barrett, though stormy enough in the past to cause them to split up, now seems destined to achieve melodramatic status. It has been learned that the couple are convinced that they had met in some pre-existing form of life and will be reunited after death.

As a lonely convict in Oregon in 1957, Mr. Gilmore had a heart tattooed on his left arm, opposite a Confederate flag on his right arm, a sentimental gesture to his birth in Texas. Last May, after he had been paroled and met Mrs. Barrett in Provo, his first mature relationship with a woman, she had her name tattooed inside the empty heart, and now it seems possible that marriage may now unite them before his death.

Prison officials could not be reached today for comment on how the state might react to such a request for marriage.

The firing squad has been maintained in this largely Mormon state because of the religion's adherence to the biblical tenet of blood atonement. Prophets of the church have reinforced the belief that a man convicted of a heinous crime can help atone for his sins if blood flows in the course of his death. Mr. Gilmore was reared as a Roman Catholic, but his lawyer says that he agrees with the blood atonement aspects of his execution.

Bureau of Indian Affairs To Expand Its Education Of Handicapped Children

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M., Nov. 13—Encouraged by a newly demonstrated interest on the part of Alaskan native and American Indian parents in the education of their handicapped children, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has announced that it would provide funds for a vast increase in special education programs for youths with physical and mental disabilities.

"This interest and concern by parents has produced a long-awaited sociological breakthrough," said Dr. Robert Hall, the bureau's director of special education, in addressing a national conference of 100 public and private representatives from education and medicine and from tribal organizations here this week.

"Immediate steps will be taken to develop local programs incorporating additional or enlarged school buildings, hiring of teaching personnel and providing transportation facilities to meet the special education requirements of 12,000 handicapped Alaskan and Indian children who are either not now attending school because they do not know that there are educational services available to them or who are not getting the training they need and to which they are entitled," Dr. Hall said.

According to Dr. Hall, the bureau has $1 million to aid in educating handicapped children and expects to have $3 million more by Oct. 1, 1977, when Public Law 94-142, popularly known as the Handicapped Persons Bill of Rights, will become fully effective.

Panel Finds Top Federal Salaries Too Low to Satisfy Capable Aides

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13—Pay for the top 22,800 Federal officials has been so eroded by inflation that the Government is having trouble attracting and retaining the highly qualified people it needs, according to testimony before a Government commission.

The commission recommends pay scales for 20,400 high-ranking civil servants, whose pay ceiling is now $39,600 a year, and 2,400 others, including judges, Cabinet officers and Congressmen, who earn up to $65,000 a year. The nine-member panel of outside experts, chosen by the President, Congress and the Federal judiciary, is scheduled to report to the President in the first week of December. There were indications that it might suggest increases for all of the workers.

According to the commission chairman, Peter G. Peterson, the group may also recommend measures that would force the disclosure of all income by legislators and regulatory officials, in order to make salary rises for those persons more palatable politically.

In two days of hearings, the commission heard repeated arguments that salaries are insufficient. Robert E. Hampton, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, said Government pay was so far below what private companies pay that "we are reaching a crisis."

"Since 1969 the executive schedule has gone up only 5 percent, while most measures of private sector pay movements have gone up more than 50 percent, and the Consumer Price Index has gone up more than 60 percent," he said, arguing that this amounted to a 35 percent pay cut over the last seven years. He urged "a very sizable pay increase."

50% Raises Suggested

Jerome M. Rosow, the chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on Federal Pay, told the commission he believed a 50 percent increase was necessary to prevent Federal executives from leaving the Government for private sector jobs.

The problem seemed to some commission members to be especially acute in the judiciary, where, according to Harold R. Tyler Jr., Deputy Attorney General, a former Federal district judge, "there is strong circumstantial evidence, if not direct evidence, that current Federal pay scales are discouraging qualified men and women from taking jobs in the judiciary."

Trial judges, who earn $42,000 a year, and appellate judges, who earn $44,650, "could make three to six times that much per annum" if they became private lawyers, Mr. Tyler said. "They feel diminished and demeaned when they see what others in the profession are able to accomplish in terms of compensation," he said.

According to Mr. Peterson, data collected by the commission on the number of people retiring early, the number of vacancies in the Government and the average length of tenure in Government jobs point to inadequacy in salaries. He cited the Social Security Administration, which has lost nine of its top 12 administrators recently, as an example.

Another problem with the pay structure is that lower ranking workers, who have received cost-of-living increases, have caught up with their superiors at the Civil Service ceiling level.

"If you have a situation where the deputy makes as much as the boss, and the deputy's deputy makes as much as the boss, then you have to call it a very serious problem," said Lane Kirkland, secretary-treasurer of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, a Presidential appointee to the commission.

Grant for Historic Sites Made

HARTFORD (AP) — The Connecticut Historical Commission has received a grant for $468,000 from the Federal Government for the preservation of historic buildings and sites. The State Preservation Officer, John Shannahan, said he had a list of 4,000 buildings eligible for funds.

NAVIGATION ...NG LAKES TEST

...nter Expected to Give ...tunity to Check Out ...ibility of Program

...al to The New York Times

E. MARIE, Mich., Nov. 13—...vill be maintained on the ...Lakes this winter for as long ...Locks here can be kept open, according to Brig. Gen. Robert Moore of the Army Corps of Engineers.

The Winter Navigation Board, which General Moore heads, "welcomes the predictions of a severe winter because it will afford us the opportunity of testing the feasibility of winter navigation under more typical conditions than prevailed in the unusually mild winters of the past four years," General Moore said.

Since 1971 the board has been conducting a winter navigation demonstration program authorized and funded by Congress in 1970. The decision to maintain navigation as long as the locks can stay open here was made for that program.

Navigation has been continuous through the last two winters, with the Sault Locks never closing because of ice. The locks, known as the "world's busiest," are on the St. Mary's River here, enabling ships to move up and down between Lakes Superior and Huron, carrying mostly iron ore in the form of taconite pellets and grain destined for Europe and Russia.

Usual Closing of Locks

Normally, the Sault Locks closed on Dec. 15 to reopen on the following April 1. The principal cargo, iron ore, carried from the mines in northern Michigan and Minnesota, froze because of its moisture content and it was not economically feasible to handle it during the winter months.

But in the 1950's methods were developed to use the region's abundancy of taconite, a low-grade ore that, when refined and milled into pellets at the mine site, is almost moisture-free.

Led by the United States Steel Corporation, the industry began campaigning for year-round navigation on the Great Lakes, primarily to get the taconite pellets to the steel furnaces of Chicago, Gary, Detroit, Toledo and Pittsburgh, as well as other economic advantages of freighter traffic through the St. Lawrence Seaway.

In 1970, Congress authorized and funded a study and demonstration program to assess the industry's desire to extend the navigation season in the St. Lawrence Seaway and on the Great Lakes.

Weather is still the basic question.

Paul E. Trimble, a retired Coast Guard vice admiral who is president of the Lake Carriers' Association, which represents the majority of owners of Great Lakes bulk-carrying ships, said in an interview that this October and November had been much colder and windier than normal.

He is supported by meteorologists who are predicting a harder-than-normal winter.

"We would welcome more severe ice, snow, and wind conditions," General Moore said, "because that will provide us with tests in more typical conditions."

Shipping Interrupted Briefly

SAULT STE. MARIE, Mich., Nov. 13 (UPI) — Most Great Lakes shipping through the Sault Locks was interrupted for almost eight hours today by a 520-foot Liberian freighter that jammed sideways in an approach channel.

Two Canadian tugs eventually straightened the ship, the Ocean Sovereign, which was slightly damaged in the accident. No injuries were reported.

The United States Army Corps of Engineers said the ship, which was carrying grain from Duluth, Minn., to Montreal, was pushed out of line by wind gusts of 35 miles per hour in the busy southbound channel of the locks connecting Lakes Huron and Superior. They said the freighter hit a pier and slid sideways, lodging against the bank and the pier.

Two locks that handle large ships were closed, but smaller vessels were able to use other facilities.

The Corps did not reveal the name of the captain, the crew size of the owner of the ship.

Monk Seal on Endangered List

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP) — The Hawaiian monk seal, said to be in danger of becoming extinct, has been placed on the Government's endangered species list to give it added protection. A Federal study showed that the sea mammal was suffering a high mortality in pups, a low reproductive rate and harassment in its habitat. The seal breeds only on the islands of the Leeward chain.

I didn't know where to turn—until SFA introduced me to The Restaurant Bag: trim leather marvels with disappearing shoulder straps that manage to look right all the time. William Buckley Reported Ex-Convict's Whereabouts To Federal Authorities

William F. Buckley Jr., the columnist who became the benefactor of Edgar H. Smith Jr., a convicted murderer who was subsequently released from prison, told the Federal authorities last month where they could find the former convict who was being sought on charges of attempted murder and kidnapping.

Mr. Smith was released from the state prison in Trenton in 1971 after serving 14 years for the murder of a 15-year-old Ramsey, N. J., girl. While in prison, including 11 years on death row, longer than any other prisoner in American penal history, he wrote two books asserting his innocence.

Mr. Buckley, who championed Mr. Smith's case in his syndicated column and television program, was out of town yesterday and could not be reached for comment. However, a family spokesman confirmed his role in the arrest of the 42-year-old former convict.

Mr. Smith was arrested Oct. 13 in a hotel room in Las Vegas, Nev., by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. He had been sought since Oct. 7, when he was named in aw arrant issued in San Diego alleging kidnapping, robbing and stabbing Lefteriva Ozhun after abducting her from a parking lot.

Trial Slated for Tuseday

He is being held in $250,000 bail and is to stand trial Tuesday in San Diego.

After the alleged assault, Mr. Smith came to New York and then went to Las Vegas, according to the F.B.I. office in Las Vegas.

Mr. Smith then tried to reach Mr. Buckley by telephone. The columnist was out of town and Mr. Smith left a name, which turned out to be an alias, and telephone number where he could be reached. Mr. Buckley turned over the information to the F.B.I., according to the family spokesman.

During his years in prison, Mr. Smith escaped death 19 times by appeal. His conviction was eventually overturned by a Federal judge who ruled that his original confession had been ocerced.

Before his release, however, in an arrangement with state officials, Mr. Smith acknowledged that he had killed the girl. His sentence was then reduced to the time he had served and he was released. He later recanted the second confession.

court of Kaiser Wilhelm II after her brother became ruling Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha in Germany through inheritance. She returned to England in 1903 and married Prince Alexander of Teck, brother of the future Queen Mary. He later became Earl of Athlone and they traveled widely for the monarchy as Governor General of South Africa and Canada and for their own pleasure.

She was a notable big-game hunter and once shot a tiger as it sprang at her. She is a favorite of Queen Elizabeth, who always sends her a telegram on her birthday. Prince Charles once included her in an opera party of young people and she was as vivacious and interested as any of them.

Her memoirs give an account of royal life in the days when palaces and castles were as drafty as they were big and keeping warm in bed was a major problem.

Typical of her anecdotes of six reigns is the time Queen Victoria chided her daughter Princess Helena for a plunging neckline. "A little rose in front, dear child," she said, "because of the footmen."

PUBLIC TV BOARD VOTES CONTRIBUTION TO THE BBC

Despite objections from organized labor, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting's board of directors has voted to contribute $1.2 million toward the British Broadcasting Corporation's six-year production of all 36 Shakespearean dramas for television.

The A.F.L.-C.I.O., the American Federation of Musicians and the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists had accused the corporation of using public funds to "export" potential jobs for Americans.

The Public Broadcasting Service itself opposed the grant but not the BBC project. PBS feels that American public television should be less dependent on British exports.

During its regular bimonthly meeting, this one in Denver, the corporation's board adpoted a resolution to continue negotiations with Time Inc., distributors here of BBC television films. Thomas W. Moore, the board's vice chairman said the corporation "will continue to encourage private funding" for the $13 million series. The completed series will be available to public television for at least three and maybe seven years; schools and colleges will have access to the programs for 14 years.

GOLDIN CITES FRAUD IN FOSTER CARE PLAN

Parents of 1,600 Children Placed in Homes Receiving $2 Million in Welfare Illegally, He Says

By CHARLES KAISER

The parents of about 1,600 children who have been placed in foster homes are illegally receiving a total of $2 million in welfare payments every year for their care, Harrison J. Goldin, New York City's Comptroller, charged yesterday.

"This results from a combination of lax administrations by the Human Resources Administration and fraud on the part of the pubic assistance recipients," Mr. Goldin said.

Auditors from the Comptroller's office have concluded that many parents failed to notify the Department of Social Services, as they are required to when their children are placed in foster homes, because they know such notification would lead to a reduction in their monthly welfare payments.

The auditors also found "widespread failure" on the part of the officials responsible for placing the children in foster care to notify the children's local welfare offices of their placement.

Both Under H.R.A. Administration

"Particularly disturbing is the fact that his costly condition could easily have been avoided, since H.R.A. administers both the foster care and public assistance program," the auditors' report said.

The response of H.R.A., which was included in the Comptrollr's audit, was to agree "you have identified a problem and we recognize that corrective action is required."

A spokesman for the administration said yesterday that it would attempt to develop a system for computerized cross-checking of the files of children placed in foster homes. "We'll try to set up a manual cross-check in the meantime," he said.

The Comptroller's office based its estimate of the extent of the fraud on a check of the records of 670 children who were in foster homes as of June 1976. The "random test-check" disclosed that 39 of the children were being carried on public assistance budgets while being cared for in the foster homes.

Cost of Care Detailed

On the basis of that finding, the auditors projected that parents of 1,623 of the 28,483 children currently in foster care in New York City were illegally receiving payments for the children they were no longer caring for.

In one case, the parent of a chld who was placed in foster care in January 1973 was still receiving public assistance for the child as of September of this year. Mr. Goldin estimated the child's parent was overpaid $2,500 while the city was paying a voluntary agency $35,000 to care for the child.

Mr. Goldin's estimate of a $2 million anual fraud was based on an annual payment for each dependent child of $1,245, including shelter and food stamp allowances.

The audit said that there were 1,002,076 people on the city's public assistance roles in July, including 627,897 dependent children.

Since 1971, public assistance has been granted on the basis of the applicant's sworn statement of financial need. Prior to that, a full field investigation was mandated in every case, the audit said.

Key Carter Trial Witness Admits Failure to Give Damaging Testimony in 1967

By LESLIE MAITLAND
Special to The New York Times

PATERSON, N.J., Nov. 13—A key prosecution witness in the second murder trial of Rubin (Hurricane) Carter and John Artis admitted under cross-examination today that she had passed up three opportunities a decade ago to give the potentially damaging testimony she provided yesterday.

The witness, Patricia Graham Valentine, who lived above the Lafayette Grill at the time of a triple murder there on June 17, 1966, and identified the getaway car in the first trial, testified yesterday that on the night of the killings she was shown a bullet and a shotgun shell that the police allegedly recovered from Mr. Carters' car.

Today, in an unusual Saturday session of Passaic County Court, Mrs. Valentine acknowledged under questioning by a defense lawyer that she had not mentioned the bullet and shell, either in her appearance before a grand jury in October 1966 or during the two occasions in which she testified at the first trial in 1967.

The question of whether the .32-caliber pistol bullet and the 12-gauge shotgun shell had been found in Mr. Carter's leased car on the day of the murders was a major issue at the first trial. The defense at the time contended that the ammunition had been planted by the police.

On the stand yesterday, Mrs. Valentine, a beautician who now lives in Florida, noted that she had spent the last month reviewing her prior testimony.

No Previous References

Today, Mr. Carter's chief counsel, Myron Beldock, asked her whether she had found any references to the substance of her new testimony.

"I've never read it in the statements," she replied.

"Or in your testimony?" Mr. Beldock asked, referring to her trial testimony in addition to her grand jury statements.

"No," Mrs. Valentine replied.

The exchange came after a morning in which Mr. Beldock probed Mrs. Valentine's testimony in an effort to demonstrate gaps in her memory.

With the exception of the mention of the ammunition and a discrepancy over where she was when she told a Paterson policeman that the defendant's car was the one she had seen speeding away from the scene of the murder, her testimony was basically the same as it had been at the 1967 trial.

Mr. Carter, a former middleweight boxer, and Mr. Artis were convicted at that trial of charges that they fired pistol and shotgun blasts that killed three parons of the Lafayette Grill at 428 East 18th Street in Paterson at 2:30 A.M. on June 17, 1966. They were both given life prison terms.

But last March, the New Jersey Supreme Court overturned the convictions, ruling that significant evidence had been withheld from the defense at the first trial. The reversal followed a series of articles in The New York Times by Selwyn Rabb, a reporter who conducted a year-long investigation of the case

Bello Changes Position

Mr. Raab's first article on the case, on Sept. 27, 1974, reported that Alfred P. Bello and Arthur Bradley, two principal witnesses against the defendants in the first trial, had recanted their testimony. That article was instrumental in the decision to reverse the convictions.

However, Mr. Bello recently again changed his position and is now believed to be the only prosecution witness who will be called upon to identify the defendants as the alleged murderers.

The second trial opened Thursday before Judge Brun L. Leopizzi of Passaic County Court in a modern, wood-paneled courtroom here. The defense had won a change of venue to Jersey City on the ground of prejudicial pretrial publicity, but on Tuesday Judge Leopizzi, over the objections of the defense, decided to move the trial back to Paterson.

However, a jury of 12 men and four women who had been selected in Hudson County is hearing the case. The jury is being sequestered in a Hudson County motel for the duration of the trial and is being bused daily to the Passaic County Courthouse.

On the trial's first day, Mr. Raab, who had been assigned to cover the proceedings for The Times, was ordered to leave the courtroom by Judge Leopizzi because he had been listed by both the defense and the prosecution as a possible witness.

Mr. Raab later was served with a subpoena by the prosecution, touching off a legal battle over the protections that the First Amendment to the United States Constitution confers on ... yers for The Times sai... and Mr. Raab would re... tion's subpoena and a... by the defense.

Auxiliary Police Force Called On To Help Stem Assaults on Elderly

By EMANUEL PERLMUTTER

The New York City Police Department has called on the 5,000-member auxiliary police force to aid in the effort to stem the rash of assaults upon and robberies of the elderly.

In orders issued in the last week, the department has asked the unarmed, unpaid voluntary officers to patrol bus stops and to walk routes on nights when the elderly are using them to attend bingo and other religious and community functions.

Although the auxiliary forces normally work only from 7 P.M. to midnight, the new police orders instruct them to increase daytime patrols and to assign their members to places where the elderly congregate and shop.

"Many of our grandparents and parents comprise the senior citizenry of our city, and we must do all we can to prevent them from becoming victims of the degenerate elements in our society," the police orders stated.

Recruiting Effort Wanted

The police directive also ordered the auxiliary officers to make special recruiting efforts to enlist new volunteers to perform duty during the daylight hours.

At a news conference yesterday, John Hyland, president of the Auxiliary Police Benevolent Association, said "I am happy hat the City of New York has realized the potential of the auxiliary police to play a more active role in the protection of the senior citizen."

He asserted, however, that the auxiliary forces would be more effective if they were permitted to make arrests. At present, they can only seek to frighten off criminals by their presence and to call city police by short-wave radio when they witness a crime. "Without the power to make an arrest, we are only window dressing," he added.

Meanwhile, the attacks on the elderly continued yesterday.

Two 15-year-old youths were arrested after they had forced Grace Baer, aged 75, into her fourth floor apartment at 655 West 190th Street as she was returning home from church. They threw her to her bed and tried to disrobe her. She screamed for help. Alarmed, the intruders seized several articles of her clothing and started to leave through the firescape.

Neighbor Phones Police

The victim's screams were heard by Rose Gilman, her next door neighbor. She telephoned the police. When the police arrived, they saw the youths departing from the fire escape, and chased them into an apartment house around the corner at 46 Wadsworth Terrace, where they arrested them.

In Brooklyn, two young men forced their way into the apartment of Elroy Machin, 63, at 716 Bushwick Avenue, in early morning. They tied Mr. Machin to his bed, cut the telephone wires, seized money and household articles and fled. Mr. Machin freed himself and called the police.

Also in Brooklyn, detectives continued their search for assailants who had severely beaten Mrs. Josephine Baier, 84, and Theodore Maros, 67, a tenant in her rooming house at 105 Sixth Avenue Friday night. They robbed Mr. Maros of $16. The two victims who had been found unconsious, were reported in serious condition yesterday at Methodist Hospital. The twin assaults occurred two blocks from Brooklyn Police Headquarters.

NORTH HILLS SCORED ON ZONING PROPOSAL

Plans by the Trustees to Change Character of Affluent Village Draw Strong Opposition

By ROY R. SILVER

Special to The New York Times

NORTH HILLS, L.I., Nov. 13—A plan by the trustees of this affluent village to change the zoning regulations and institute a master plan that would radically change the character of the community has met strong opposition.

Bucolic North Hills, with less than 300 residents, is one of the few bastions of lush estates redolent of early days in Nassau County, before the incursion of houses on small plots, shopping centers, high-rise office buildings and the concommitant problems of traffic and demands for municipal services.

The landowners include William S. Paley, chairman of the Columbia Broadcasting System; Mrs. Vincent de Roulet, a daughter of the late Joan Whitney Payson and niece of John Hay Whitney; J. Peter Grace, the head of W. R. Grace & Company, an international conglomerate founded on the former Grace shipping line fortune, and Joseph A. Martino, former president and board chairman of the National Lead Company.

The 1,757-acre village, which was incorporated in 1929, is generally zoned for homes on a minimum two-acre plot. However, many of the estates run from 30 to 100 acres. The median income of the residents is more than $30,000—among the highest on Long Island.

Commission Rejects Plan

The plan by the village to change the zoning to include retail, office and commercial buildings, as well as condominiums, was rejected unanimously two weeks ago by the Nassau County Planning Commission.

The plan also calls for a regional shopping center in an area already zoned for such use, and this, too, has been condemned by the Planning Commission and residents of the contiguous communities.

While the village trustees have not said why they sought to implement their plan to change the character of the village, some outside residents suggest that the reason is primarily financial.

Owen T. Smith, chairman of the Planning Commission, said: "If this zoning proposal is adopted, there are a number of substantial property owners in the village who stand to make fabulous profits through the sale of their property."

'Self-Interest' Charged

Mr. Smith noted that the value of the property depends, among other factors, on its most intense use. Thus, the value of an acre zoned only for residential use would be worth considerably less than the same property that would be used for business or commercial purposes.

The value of the property would more than double, Mr. Smith said. Several speakers at a public hearing last week attributed the board's desire to implement the plan to "self-interest."

Virtually all of the speakers among the more than 500 residents who overflowed the meeting room at the Buckley Country Day School at the public hearing supported the County Planning Commission in its objections to the plan.

Assemblyman Irwin J. Landes, Democrat-Liberal, who represents part of the the effects of the plan could be "cataclysmic and very well catastrophic."

Assemblyman Angelo F. Orazio, Democrat-Liberal, whose district also includes part of the incorporated village, also denounced the proposal and said that water, sewer and lighting districts that serve the village could legally deny the village their services.

The question of home rule was discussed, and it was generally agreed that an incorporated village had the right to determine how it would zone its property. However, the two Assemblymen and several other speakers said it would be morally wrong for the village to approve zoning changes that would affect neighboring communities.

Both Mr. Landes and Mr. Orazio said they would seek legislation that would force local communities to consider the economic and environmental impact on neighboring areas before they were permitted to rezone.

Michael J. Tully, the Supervisor of the Town of North Hempstead, in which North Hills is situated, criticized the plan strongly and said it would be impossible for either the town or the county to provide municipal services necessary for a village that was expected to have a population of 10,000 by 1990 if the zoning was changed.

Plan Called Deficient

He said he would use all the power at his command as the top official in the town and as a member of the County Board of Supervisors to see that the plan was not implemented. He termed it "dangerously deficient."

The master plan by the village calls for 1.4 million square feet of office space and 1.6 million square feet of retail space to be constructed. It also provides for cluster developments that would substantially increase the village's population and result in a demand for municipal services such as sewage and solid-waste disposal and police protection.

Mr. Tully said that the town could not now adequately handle the sewage and waste-disposal functions and under no circumstances could it serve a larger population.

It was also said that the local school district would be unable to provide facilities for an anticipated increase in educational needs if the plan were adopted.

Only two builders and one resident supported the village's plan. The builders said that construction would generate many jobs and that commercial space would provide the town, village and school district with a large amount of tax revenue.

At the opening of the public hearing, Mr. Grace said the trustees were there to listen to remarks and suggestions and had not committed themselves to passing the zoning ordinance. A decision on what steps to take will be made after the transcripts of the meeting have been read and discussed, Mr. Grace added.

Although the County Planning Commission was unanimous in opposing the plan, the Village Board, by a majority vote plus one, could override the commission. Since the Village Board has five trustees, this would mean that at least four of the five members would have to vote to implement the changes.

If the board does vote to change the zoning and institute the proposed master plan, a long court fight can be expected.

Robert Uihlein, Schlitz Chairman And Former President, Dies at 60

By MURRAY ILLSON

Robert A. Uihlein Jr.

Robert A. Uihlein Jr., chairman and chief executive officer of the Jos. Schlitz Brewing Company and a member of one of the country's most prominent brewing and banking families, died Friday night at Milwaukee County Medical Complex, which he entered on Oct. 21 for treatment of leukemia. He was 60 years old.

Mr. Uihlein, who was once described as "one of the beer barons who made Milwaukee famous," was the fourth generation of his family to head the 127-year-old Schlitz company. His great-great uncle, August Krug, founded the company in Milwaukee in 1849, and it grew into what has been described as the nation's second largest brewing concern.

In the tradition of his family, Mr. Uihlein attended the United States Brewers Academy and the Wallerstein Laboratories in New York for special training in brewing. He joined Schlitz full-time in 1942 in the sales personnel division. He was named a vice president in 1945, became vice president in charge of sales six years later, executive vice president in 1959 and in 1961 was named company president.

Under his direction, Schlitz posted sales and production records for 14 years in succession. Production rose from 6,880,000 barrels of beer in 1962 to 23,279,000 barrels last year. Sales for 1975 were a record $1,130,439,000.

Expert Polo Player

A husky man with the physique of a football tackle, Mr. Uihlein stood 6 feet, 4½ inches tall and weighed 225 pounds. He was an ardent big-game hunter, an expert polo player who did much to establish polo as a major league sport in Milwaukee and an earnest patron of the arts.

The Schlitz company often sponsored free concerts by the New York Philharmonic in Central Park. In 1965, when 70,000 people attended the Schlitz concert, it became front page news.

One observer questioned at the time whether the forewing company's investment in fine music helped to sell Schlitz beer. He pointed out to Mr. Uihlein that at the opening night concert empty beer cans of other brewers were strewn on the ground but twhe erer ez.n lcns ahtio Sc ground but there were no Schlitz cans.

Mr. Uihlein was ready with an answer. "Schlitz drinkers," he said, "are quality drinkers. They use receptacles for their beer cans."

Robert August Uihlein Jr. (the family name is pronounced EE-line) was born in Milwaukee on March 26, 1916. He graduate from Phillips Academy at Andover, Mass., in 1934, from Harvard University with a bachelor of science degree in 1938 and from the University of Wisconsin with a law degree in 1941.

When Mr. Uihlein became president of Schlitz in 1961, he succeeded his uncle, Erwin C. Uihlein, who was named chairman. In an interview the following year, the new company president said:

"My uncle and his predecessors did an excellent job. But with changing conditions in the business, changes in our organization had to come. I found a need for delegating more authority through division heads, with myself merely setting the destinations. My predecessors centralized authority.

"I think the atmosphere is much clearer now. I think we've established complete communication among our own people. We are hiring more real marketing people and aiding wholesalers in doing a beter job."

Relinquished Presidency

In 1967, Mr. Uihlein took on the additional duties of board chairman at Schlitz. He relinquished the presidency earlier this year but remained chairman and chief executive officer.

Mr. Uihlein was a director of the United States Brewers Association. In banking he was a member of the board of directors and the executive committee of the First Wisconsin National Bank of Milwaukee, the state's largest; the First Wisconsin Trust Company, and the parent First Wisconsin Corporation.

Mr. Uihlein was a former Milwaukee cancer campaign chairman and at his death was a director of the American Cancer Society's Milwaukee division.

H was a trustee of th Milwaukee Art Centeh, a member of the National Business Committee for th Arts and a director of the New York Philhormonic.

Mr. Uihlein leaves his wife, the former Lorraine Glaeser, and two sons, Robert A. 3d and James I. Uihlein.

A funeral service will be held at 3 P.M. tomorrow at St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Milwaukee. Burial will be at the Forest Home Cemetery there.

WALTER PISTON, 82, COMPOSER, TEACHER

Winner of 2 Pulitzer Prizes for His Symphonies Is Dead

By EDWARD HUDSON

Walter Piston, a distinguished American composer and teacher of music who won the Pulitzer Prize for Music in 1948 and 1961, died on Friday at his home in Belmont, Mass. He was 82 years old.

Mr. Piston, a professor emeritus of music at Harvard University, where he taught from 1926 until 1960, had written largely for orchestra and chamber ensembles. However, his theater piece in 1938, "The Incredible Flutist," composed for a ballet, was an exception.

His works included numerous concertos, orchestral suites, five string quartets and eight symphonies. The Pulitzer awards were for his Third and Seventh Symphonies.

Books Considered Classics

He had also written textbooks on harmony, counterpoint and orchestration that were considered classics in the field.

Olin Downes, the music critic, once described the composer as a man "who has thoroughly mastered the ground principles of his art; who knows what he wants to do and how to do it; whose basis is a thorough command of counterpoint and form, on which is superimposed brilliant treatment of the orchestra."

In accepting the Edward MacDowell Medal in 1974 on Mr. Piston's behalf, Michael Steinberg, a music critic, spoke of the composer as a deeply, richly conservative composer who referred to his own music as "mid-Victorian."

"But it is a wonderful, lucid transparent mid-Victorian that shows us that the vitality of a work has nothing to do with its modishness," Mr. Steinberg said. "The man and the music fit so beautifully together. It seems so cool and neat and so beautifully built that it takes a particular ear to become attuned to the quirks that give it the often-witty and warm individuality that it has." Mr. Steinberg ended by applying a quotation from Emily Dickinson to the composer: "Pardon my sanity in a world insane."

Walter Piston was born on Jan. 20, 1894, in Rockland, Me., where his grandfather had settled after his arrival from Italy. The family dropped the final "e" from the grandfather's name, Pistone. He moved to Boston at the age of 10.

Picked Up Musical Skills

As a young man, he could play the piano and violin with equal efficiency and he used these skills to earn a living in cafes around Boston. During World War I, he was in a service band, and taught himself to play most of the wind instruments. "They were just lying around," he said, "and no one minded if you picked them up and found out what they could do."

In 1919, he enrolled in Harvard's music department, where he soon became an assistant to Archibald P. Davidson. He was graduated in 1924 with highest honors, including a summa cum laude in music, and was awarded a traveling fellowship. This enabled him to study in Paris with Nadia Boulanger. Then he returned to Harvard to teach, and was Walter W. Naumburg Professor of Music from 1948 to 1960, when he retired from Harvard.

His numerous awards included a Guggenheim Fellowship and the Coolidge Medal in 1935 and the New York Music Critics Circle Award in 1945 and 1959.

His textbooks included "Harmonic Analysis," "Harmony," "Counterpoint" and "Orchestration."

Survivors include two brothers.

Standard National Test For High School Diplomas Is Backed by 65% in Poll

Two-thirds of the American public thinks that high school students should be required to pass a standard nationwide examination to get a high school diploma, according to the Gallup Poll.

The survey indicated a significant increase in the number of people who favor such a test since 1958, when a similar poll found 50 percent of the public supporting a standardized examination for a high school diploma. In 1958 39 percent opposed the idea and 11 percent were undecided. In the current survey, 65 percent were for it, 31 percent were against it and 4 percent were undecided.

The quality of public education has come under increased public criticism in recent years as Scholastic Aptitude Test scores have been declining. However, some educators have charged that the S.A.T., which is a standardized test given to high school students applying for college entrance, is not fair to blacks and other minorities.

The survey also found that, of the 1,549 persons interviewed, those who were the most in favor of the standardized examination were the ones who would have the hardest time passing it. Seventy-six percent of those with a grade-school education thought there should be such a test; 18 percent were opposed and 6 percent were undecided.

Among those with high school educations, 69 percent supported the idea of a standardized test while 27 percent were against it and 4 percent were undecided. And 53 percent of the people who had at least one year of college education favored the concept; 44 percent opposed it and 3 percent were undecided.

The survey found little difference in the opinions of men and women, or whites and nonwhites. Likewise, there was little difference between those in the East, South, Middle West and West.

In cities with populations of 2,500 or more, about 69 percent favored the examination. But in towns with less than 2,500 and in rural areas, only 58 percent were for a test to get a high school diploma; 35 percent were opposed and 7 were undecided.

Those 18 to 29 years old were less favorably included toward the examination than were their elders. Some 71 percent of those over 50 liked the idea.

Another variation in atitudes was that 64 percent of the parents who had children in parochial schools supported the concept of the examination, but only 53 percent of those with children in public schools supported it.

The survey, conducted last spring, was funded by the Institute for Development of Educational Activities, which is an affiliate of the Charles F. Kettering Foundation. The question asked was: "Should all high school students in the United States be required to pass a standard nationwide examination in order to get a high school diploma?" The margin of eror in the same is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

CITY HOUSING AUDIT BY LEVITT IS GLOOMY

Finds 'Steadily Worsening Situation' In Mitchell-Lama Program as Arrears Increase

JOSEPH P. FRIED

State Comptroller Arthur Levitt said yesterday that despite New York City's attempt to remedy serious financial problems in its Mitchell-Lama housing program, the program was still in a "steadily worsening situation" that further threatened the city's tenuous fiscal health.

The total arrears in repaying mortgage loans in the programs, which were $51 million in May, a rise of almost a third from $35 million a year before a report by Mr. Levitt said.

Over about 150 rental and cooperative apartment projects housing 50,000 families have been built under this program, which provides long-term, reduced-interest mortgage loans and sizable property-tax exemptions to limited-profit and nonprofit developers.

Plans for still more projects to be built unde the program have been suspended because of the city's fiscal crisis.

Mr. Levitt's gloomy findings on the condition of the housing completed under the program confirm the findings in a number of other studies done in the recent past by other analysts.

All have found that an extremely high number of the projects are in arrears in repaying the mortgage loans that the city extended to make construction and development possible.

Seventy percent of the projects showed arrears, according to the report, which held that inadequate rents and cooperative charges were the major cause.

'Steadily Worsening Situation'

Last january, a study sponsored by the nonprofit Economic Development Council of New York City found that 60 percent of the city's Mitchell-Lama projects were three months or more behind in their mortgage payments to the city, and that the arrears then totaled $44 million.

According to the Levitt study: "The steadily worsening situation threatens to collapse the self-sustaining aspects of the Mitchell-Lama program. This, in turn, will impose the full burden of the debt obligations upon the city, already in deep financial crisis."

Thomas Appleby, new York City's Housing and Development Administrator, said he had not seen the Levitt report and would have to withhold detailed comment. But he noted that the city had been moving to impose higher rents and cooperative carrying charges in many of the projects in an attempt to overcome the problems.

Other city officials note that Mitchell-Lama housing, like all housing, has been severely buffeted by inflation in costs.

Indeed, many Mitchell-Lama tenants insist that the rents and carrying charges are being raised beyond their ability to pay and that they are being priced out of their apartments. Some of the increases have been quite steep—25 and 30 percent, with more in prospect.

Growing resistance to the city rent-rise moves has included court suits by tenants and rent-withholding, and in some cases tenants charge that high rent needs stem from faulty original construction. City officials also fear that, in a few buildings with already high charges, attempts to increase those charges to the levels needed could lead to move-outs and high vacancies.

A spokesman for Mr. Levitt acknowledged that the city had begun to "get more forceful" than it previously had been in pressing for rent and carrying-charge increases. But generally these are still not enough, he said. The Levitt report itself noted that, of 11 projects studied that received increases in fiscal 1975, "nine still had costs exceeding income after the increases."

Monthly rents and cooperative carrying charges vary widely in the city's Mitchell-Lama developments, from about $40 a room in older projects built when construction costs were much lower than now, to about $100 or more a room in the most recent developments.

Still another serious problem, the Levitt report said, is failure by the city to enforce its own policy on collecting rent and carrying-charge payments from tenants who fall behind in their monthly obligations.

A Complication for City

Among the effects of the Mitchell-Lama financial problem is that it complicates the city's current effort to raise $350 million in cash by selling some of the mortgages on projects built under the program.

New York State also has a program in which apartments have been built with Mitchell-Lama financing. But except for the 15,000-family Co-op City in the Bronx, the largest of the state Mitchell-Lama projects, all the state projects "are meeting their debt service," although some are "scraping by," a state housing spokesman said.

Co-op City was the scene of a 13-month dispute in which residents withheld millions of dollars in carrying charges as they fought a 25 percent increase in these payments. The increase is currently in abeyance while a tenant-management group is running the project and seeking to make it solvent.

In a second report on a New York City housing program—the low-rent projects run by the City Housing Authority—Mr. Levitt criticized aspects of the authority's police force.

Patrolling Called Insufficient

The 1,600-member force does not sufficiently patrol the interior of project buildings, Mr. Levitt held. And he said that both tht Housing authority and the city's Employees Retirement System had made "insufficient efforts" to effect the retirement of 31 housing police officers who were on extended sick leave last year. The 31, while on such leave, cost the authority more than $1 million in pay and fringe benefits.

A Housing Authority spokesman said his agency "simply disagrees" with the conclusions on interior patrolling. And he said that 12 of the sick officers had by now been retired, one had returned to full duty and another had been "terminated." While the cases of the remaining 17 "rest entirely with the retirement board now."

Fire Inspectors Find 10 Social Clubs Closed

Firemen inspecting social clubs in the wake of last month's fire in a South Bronx club that claimed 25 lives, found 10 of the neighborhood gathering spots closed Friday night, a City Hall spokesman said yesterday. The spokesman, noting that no advance warnings of the inspections are given, could offer no explanation on why the clubs were closed on what is normally one of their busiest nights. The 10 closed clubs were among 71 visited Friday by inspectors checking for building and fire code violations. Thus far, 298 of the clubs have been inspected, with 32 fire code violations found 67 possible violations that will involve later inspections and four summonses issued for major violations.

Parking Charge to Rise

About 3,000 parking meters in Queens will be converted from 10 cents an hour to 10 cents a half-hour beginning Wednesday, the New York City Traffic Department announced. The rate change is designed to increase the number of legal short-term parking opportunities for motorists on essential business by minimizing "meter feeding"—the illegal depositing of coins to extend the prescribed parking time. The meters will all remain as two-hour meters.

Teen-Age Girls, in Boston Study, Drink Almost as Often as Boys

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Nov. 13 (UPI)—Teen-age girls are drinking and getting drunk almost as often as boys, according to a study of social habits in Boston-area schools.

The study, published in the Rutgers University Journal of Studies on Alcohol, says that a similar study in 1965 showed that boys drank much more often than girls.

The latest study was based on a survey of 1,750 junior and senior high school students in middle-class and industrial neighborhoods in the Boston area.

Forty-seven per cent of the high school boys reported being drunk on beer at least five times in a one-year period, and 23 per cent said they were drunk on distilled spirits. Among girls, 38 per cent said they were drunk on beer five times and 27 per cent on liquor.

U.S. NOW LISTS MOSCOW AS AN 'UNHEALTHY POST'

MOSCOW, Nov. 12 (AP)—The Soviet capital, never regarded as a cushy spot for American diplomats, is now being listed as an "unhealthy post" and hardship benefits for embassy employees are being improved.

An administrative notice circulated at the embassy Friday said Moscow's listing as unhealthy, effective Dec. 1, was "based upon the [State] Department's evaluation of reported environmental conditions regarding sanitation and disease, medical and hospital facilities and climate."

The post differential, sometimes referred to as a hardship allowance, was increased Oct. 1 from 15 to 20 percent of salary for diplomats and other embassy employees in Moscow.

Embassy officials said one factor in the worsening conditions for Moscow is the prevalence of giardarsis, an intestinal disorder that is believed to be spread in drinking water. Not included in the hazards given by embassy sources was the persistent microwave radiation of the embassy building, disclosed nearly a year

Mexican Envoy at United Nations Begins Campaign for Echeverria

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., Nov. 12—President Luis Echeverria Alvarez of Mexico has placed his campaign for Secretary General of the United Nations on an official basis by beginning consultations with the members of the Security Council.

Mr. Echeverria had indicated his intention of running against the incumbent, Kurt Waldheim, if he felt there was sentiment favoring his candidacy. Mr. Waldheim's term ends Dec. 31, and he announced last month that he was ready to serve another term.

Roberto de Rosenzweig-Diaz, chief delegate of Mexico, said that he had started consultations on behalf of President Echeverria by meeting privately and individually with members of the Security Council. He also has been seeking talks with other countries. The results so far have been "encouraging," he said.

F.A.A. MODIFIES PROPOSAL ON SUPERSONIC JET NOISE

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12 (UPI)—The Federal Aviation Administration sharply modified Friday its proposals for international standards for supersonic jet noise in a compromise with the states of New York, Illinois and Massachusetts.

Attorneys for the three states withdrew a motion for a court restraining order after getting the agency's assurances that no international standard that might be adopted would prevent it from imposing stricter standards in this country.

The legal move concerned proposals the F.A.A. will present to the International Civil Aviation Organization's Committee on Aircraft Noise at a two-week conference starting Monday in Montreal.

The three states had charged that the agency initially planned to recommend that international noise standards for supersonic jets be delayed until 1984. They said this might prevent it from adopting stricter domestic standards.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12 (Reuters) — Complaints about the Concorde from people living around Washington's Dulles Airport fell sharply in October even though the Anglo-French supersonic airliner made nine more flights, the F.A.A. said today.

—Edmund Wilson.

"Action Is Character." — F. Scott Fitzgerald's final note for "The Last Tycoon."

These four perspectives on "The Last Tycoon" illustrate not only the degree to which the conception of Fitzgerald's unfinished study of Hollywood lies in the eye of the beholder, but also the special scrutiny that the film, directed by Elia Kazan, is bound to undergo from those who may question how faithfully Mr. Kazan and Harold Pinter, the scriptwriter, transposed a classic novel for the screen. The movie opens in New York on Wednesday.

Conceding that his movie takes some liberties with Fitzgerald's story, Mr. Kazan, in an interview the other day, argued that he had faithfully captured "the spirit" of the book. Others may not be so sure. But since the 44,000-word fragment that Fitzgerald was shaping at his death in 1940 did not have an ending, except in notes that were pulled together by Edmund Wilson, his literary executor, there is room for a variety of suppositions as to what would happen to Stahr, the Hollywood tycoon, after his drunken battle with Brimmer, the writers' union organizer. The fragment ends with that fight.

What is generally agreed, though, is that Fitzgerald patterned Monroe Stahr, his last tycoon, on Irving Thalberg, the M-G-M production chief who died in 1936 at the age of 37. Fitzgerald met Thalberg during his first stint in Hollywood, in 1927, and worked for him in the fall and winter of 1931. And in 1937, when Fitzgerald returned to Hollywood for the final three years of his life, he heard scores of Thalberg stories, for by this time Thalberg had become a mythic person larger than life. "There is no doubt that Fitzgerald was enormously impressed by Thalberg, and put his conception of him into Stahr," according to Prof. Matthew J. Bruccoli, a Fitzgerald scholar.

Since the movie is about Hollywood and the innards of making pictures, Paramount's film inevitably raises questions about how probingly Hollywood scrutinizes Hollywood. Mr. Kazan, knowledgeable out of his own experiences as the director of such films as "A Streetcar Named Desire," "On the Waterfront" and "Baby Doll," said that the movie is "realistic Hollywood," and there are many touches in the film that would seem to bear him out.

Fitzgerald's own attitude toward Hollywood is difficult to discern from the novel. He is descriptive and keeps his story anchored tightly to the character of Stahr. There are no significant asides, no moralizing. By adhering closely to the novel, the movie does not make any explicit statement.

Nonetheless, it does leave the impression, in a split-focus fashion, that Hollywood is more comfortable with illusion than with reality, and that certainly Stahr is more self-assured in dealing with actors and actresses than he is with those whose lives are not fully absorbed in the studios and back lots. In the movie, for example, an aging actress is made to appear young and attractive; reality is superseded, in part through Stahr's touch. But in what might be called reality situations, Hollywood is portrayed as uncomfortable—in dealings, for example, with the alien presence of a writers' union organizer. Or, again, in Stahr's tongue-

Paddy Chayefsky: 'TV Will Do Anything for A Rating. Anything!'

By JOAN BARTHEL

It all began one autumn night when Paddy Chayefsky was playing poker, six or seven or eight years ago—he doesn't remember how many. He was losing—he doesn't remember how much. After a while, he and another player, Howard Gottfried, went for a walk down Central Park West—he doesn't remember how far. They talked about television. Chayefsky hadn't written for TV since the 1950's, but he still watched it a lot. He was still interested. Howard Gottfried had worked for a company that produced TV shows, including "Gilligan's Island." Although a lot of people had been calling television a lot of unkind names for a long time, both men felt there was more to be said. Something satirical. "Nothing definitive has been written about television," Howard Gottfried said, and the writer agreed somewhat enigmatically. "It's a definitive industry," he declared.

Joan Barthel is the author of "A Death in Canaan," the story of Peter Reilly, a teen-ager who was accused of murdering his mother.

So Paddy Chayefsky wrote a screenplay, and Howard Gottfried produced it, and their friend Sidney Lumet directed it, and today, six or seven or eight years after that poker game, their television satire is opening in New York. The film is "Network," a two-hour look at the bizarre, sometimes crazy, sometimes funny, sometimes scary doings in the world inhabited by television folks, especially their boardrooms and their bedrooms. Although the film is aimed at an assortment of targets, including reformers, revolutionaries both black and white, creeping conglomerates and, not at all incidentally, you and me, the basic story centers on a TV newscaster who announces on the air that, in a week, he intends to blow his brains out on camera.

Even the more blase viewers are intrigued. The ratings improve so marvelously that the network, instead of firing the fellow, makes him a star. He is ballyhooed as a mad prophet and given a nightly show—news and prophesies in a glittering variety format, complete with applause and music and dazzling special effects. The man is lucid, nutty, rambling, interesting, grotesque, and so, some may feel, is the film—two hours that are jammed with denunciations and confrontations, tears and jokes and screams, a few laughs, lots of angry speeches.

For a man who views the world as "a demented slaughterhouse" — a phrase from one of those angry speeches—Paddy Chayefsky seemed a surprisingly cheerful fellow, when he and his producer and I met to talk about the film. The writer works in an eleventh-floor office in midtown, ot long ago, I rediscovered two letters I wrote shortly after the death of F. Scott Fitzgerald with whom I spent the last years of his life. Both letters concerned st Tycoon," a novel he hoped restore his reputation to the he had achieved with "This Paradise" and "The Great "

of the letters, dated Jan. 11, as to Maxwell Perkins, Scott's editor at Scribner's. In it, I discussed Scott's plans for the title. For a while, he had considered calling the novel "Stahr." The working title was "The Last Tycoon." But about three weeks before he died, he said to me with a grin, "What do you think of this title—'The Love of the Last Tycoon'?" My first reaction was, "I'm not sure." He wasn't sure either.

The second letter, dated March 6, 1941, is addressed to Edmund Wilson, who edited the manuscript and wrote the foreword to "The Last Tycoon" when it was published by Scribner's.

Renewed interest in the novel and the soon-to-be-released film may make this correspondence pertinent today. Herewith, the full text of my letters to Wilson:

ART VIEW

HILTON KRAMER

The Considerable but Troubling Achievements of Mr. Hoving

The departure of Thomas P. F. Hoving from the directorship of the Metropolitan Museum of Art on Dec. 31, 1977—reported by Grace Glueck in this paper on Nov. 5—will mark the end of an extraordinary chapter in the history of American museology. The Hoving decade at the Met has been a decade of ebullition, and we shall be a long time coming to terms with the vast changes that have resulted from to terms with the vast changes that have resulted from the incessant, sometimes inspired, often solid but also often damaging and wearying activity that has been the distinguishing feature of this most publicized of all museum careers.

Whatever else the Metropolitan may have been in the Hoving era, it has not been dull. There were times, indeed, in this decade when one almost prayed for a little dullness—the kind of dullness that once allowed us to visit this noble repository of works of art, and concentrate on them, without having to worry much about what might happen next. But it was not to be. Mr. Hoving, if he accomplished nothing else (and he did, of course, accomplish a good deal more), kept us constantly alerted to the fact that the art museum would never again be what it once was—a place where time seemed to stand still, where change came (if at all) discreetly and without fanfare, where we might feel (if only for a few blessed moments) safely beyond the reach of the devouring pace that ruled our lives elsewhere. There were many pleasures to be experienced at the Met in these years, but a sense of distance from the dynamics and even the vulgarities of the world outside was not often among them.

It is important, I think, to recognize that Mr. Hoving,

The Care and Feeding Of Playwrights

ey, you missed one. You missed it, that is to say, unless you are a Phoenix Theater subscriber and sufficiently loyal to have followed the organization uptown this year to its new, handsome, comfortable, probably temporary home at the Marymount Manhattan Theater t Street. (I say "probably temporary" because has always been probably temporary, possessed st, shifting its headquarters along with its tac- ssity and convenience have seemed to dictate; oved as durable as that bird it took for guardian ssed Kevin O'Morrison's "Ladyhouse Blues" Phoenix has once again adopted a new policy, kes me as being precisely appropriate to this ur theatrical adventurings. Instead of relying for its bread, butter and excuse to go on, and the happier revivals run for as long as box- allows, it's opted for seven new plays—by laywrights—each of which will be given no 2 performances. Thus we will be offered a ecent look at what's on tap for the future, —shall we say—by success.

nean to spend my entire time here on "Lady- partly because it's closing tonight (though it's at the Dallas Theater Center concurrently with howcasing, and will be turning up again, I), and partly because I want to explain why I oenix is on the right track for the season. can't be bypassed altogether; it's far too h too authentic, for that.

nticity doesn't come from its mere marshaling ria to let us know that we are in the early 19, and that the mother and four daughters hores, occasional songs, and blunt, hearty e kitchen are women without men. The son old hasn't come home from his Navy stint in yet; and because the neighborhood is German- of its males—draftable or not—have marched y their once-questioned patriotism. Passing those of street vendors, of evangelists whoop- revivalist tent meeting—can indeed be heard ; but they are ghost voices mocking, as they mocked by, the vibrantly alive, mettlesome, tspoken members of a troubled household.

en come on like truth itself because of the they pour into the fleeting, empty, often des- and nights that are in fact occupied with e royal can erupt over so simple a matter as the meaning of the lyrics of "Ja-Da," sung with a secret, sullen smile by a daughter temporarily separated from her husband and taking comfort in furtive nips from a bottle in her bedroom. The lyrics of the song are, as it happens, meaningless; they say so. But mother, slapping the table hard with the palm of her calloused hand and tossing her head haughtily to display her blurred blond good looks, is a commonsensical sort who will have no truck with meaninglessness. Life may be inexplicable, and this woman will turn from her Bible to let the Lord know it ("Tell you what, Lord," is her mode of address), but songs —in her house—had better make sense.

A flurry like a panic in a dovecote can come of the group disagreement over the movie they want to see tonight: will it be Elsie Janis or William Desmond? (Trooping off for an evening's forgetfulness, they will leave every door and window in the house open to drive the heat from the premises; the habits of a long-gone time are casual, and can evoke a nostalgic regret in us.) More serious matters are met with vigorous scorn. One sister has been forced to live apart from husband and child because she is consumptive. She takes it out, with bitter irrelevance, on an unseen fish-peddler who is hawking his wares, snarling at him ("That man is a fraud!") just as we now snarl at television commercials. Ill or well, blood runs high.

In their vulnerabilities, all are strong. Mother refuses to sell off a farm they've had to abandon because she will not be "at the mercy of the city." The youngest, cooling herself with a fan held between her toes as she idles cross-legged atop a bureau, lets it be known she may marry a Greek boy she's met at the local hash-house in which she works. Pressed hard to explain what conceivable virtue a Greek might possess, she lets reflection play across her confident, open face until she can summon up a single word. "Gentle," she says. "He won't stay that way long" snaps the consumptive. "Yes he will" returns the girl, not defiantly but with a smile. The exchange is repeated, word for word. Each time the smile grows simpler, warmer, more certain—until it is heartbreaking.

When a Government telegram is read announcing the death from cholera of the boy expected home, mother scarcely skips a beat. They must instantly do what they have been told to do, claim the boy's belongings, claim his remains if they can, though they will refuse his insurance because they won't have money bought with blood ("Now let's get cracking!" mother commands, reaching for the hatpin that will hold her only broad-brimmed black in place). Tears are for later, if then. "Living itself is a mortal business"; get on with it.

Jane Galloway and Guy Boyd are man and wife in Bill Hauptman's "Domino Court," Thursday at the American Place.

The play, as it stands, could plainly do with a bolder narrative line. It's mainly mood music, and wants just a little more theater in it. But Mr. O'Morrison has given it everything else in abundance: distinctive human voices, busy hands that belong to people, humor and despair as good companions, an aura of wistful poetry behind all that is so animated, so stubborn, so ignorant and so innocent. He is beyond question a playwright to be nourished and waited for: it shouldn't be long. In the meantime, the Phoenix has done him full justice by providing him with a remarkably sensitive company (perfection straight down the line) and, in Tony Giordano, with a "find" of a director.

And this, as I suggested earlier, is a ripe moment for handing young playwrights everything we've got on a platter. The Phoenix, of course, is by no means alone in the present effort. In fact, it's come late—though opportunely —to it. The workshops of Off Off Broadway have been laboring mightily to get novices started for some years now. This season Joseph Papp's Public Theater will be returning to the fray in earnest: four full productions and up to a dozen workshop ventures are either in rehearsal or scheduled. There is a new feeling of urgency abroad in the land.

Why is it so important that we offer the maximum number of new writers exposure this very minute? Because we're in a situation that's new, that's odd, and that may blow up in our faces if we don't act quickly.

We've got an audience ready and waiting. Everyone knows that there's been a radical increase in the number of theatergoers—and in the size of theatergoers' appetites —during the past three years. After a long period of drought in which no one seemed to want to go to the theater under any circumstances, a mysterious tide turned, once-alienated audiences began congregating in midtown,

"O'Casey's method was the nihilistic naturalism one associates with Gorky."

They Weren't Riotous Comedies, But Riot-Provoking Dramas

The appearance on stage of a prostitute in O'Casey's "The Plough and the Stars" was only the ostensible cause of the Dublin riot in 1926. Above, the Abbey Theater's production which opens on Wednesday at Brooklyn Academy of Music.

WILLIAM H. HONAN

The edi- ...luded with a call to arms: ...bey] company might proper- ...n forcible hint in the way ... of rotten eggs and decayed ...

... many high-spirited readers ...ummons to heart. On open- ing night, when Synge's hero Christy Mahon bragged "I killed my father," a number of hrogues bellowed from the audience "Shame! Shame!" Immediately, there was a din of booing, catcalling and hissing. From the gallery, a sweet potato swept through the air and thudded into the wings. This was followed by a shower of vegetables and an increased volume of booing. The actors ducked and retreated upstage, but not before they had sustained two casualties: a potato bounced off the head of Miss Ethney McGee who was playing Pegeen, and Arthur Sinclair (who later went to Hollywood) was struck on the knee by another airborne vegetable. The stage manager's voice called out, "Go on with the play!" and the actors valiantly continued to play their parts as if in a dumbshow while remaining as far upstage as possible.

There were loud cries from the audience of "Put 'em off!" along with a withering hail of eggs and vegetables, a tin cigar box, a cigarette case, an old watch (which the owner tried to reclaim after the riot), and many strings of rosary beads which were hurled at the stage as a final insult. Next, a number of soft, white paper boxes landed on the stage and broke open. These were hydrogen sulfide bombs which released a gas smelling like rotten eggs.

At this point the doors of the theater burst open and between 75 and 100 policemen trotted into the theater. The police, mostly Irish themselves, were reluctant to call an end to this donnybrook, but eventually nine token arrests were made; two bartenders, two clerks, an instructor, a compositor, a mason, an electrician and a harnessmaker. The captives were marched out of the theater, received with roaring acclaim by a crowd gathered outside and then taken to a nearby station house where each man was fined from $2 to $10. A woman testified that she had been sitting behind the harnessmaker and had seen him peg four eggs at the stage. He paid the $10 fine.

Rioting was quelled during subsequent performances in New York by toughened-up police tactics. Inspector McClusky, who was in charge of the theater district, ordered: "A hiss or a stinkpot and out the guy goes." He added: "And if you see a mut with a bulge in the pocket of his overcoast, smash it. If it runs yellow at the hem of his garment—throw him out on suspicion." Seven theater-goers with suspicious-looking bulges in their overcoats were evicted from the theater on the second night, and a few more the following night, but otherwise, the Abbey Theater rioting was over—for a while, at least

In the years immediately preceding and after independence, which was finally achieved with the establishment of the Irish Free State in 1921, the theatrical scene in Dublin was uncharacteristically tame. Synge had died of cancer. And William Butler Yeats, a co-founder of the Abbey whose poetic drama "The Countess Cathleen" had ignited the first of the Abbey Theater riots in 1899, had married and moved to London. Yeats's fascination with the occult led him to the Japanese No plays, and he had befriended a Japanese dancer, a certain Mr. Ito, with whom he was working on a dance-drama entitled "At the Hawk's Well." Yeats and Mr. Ito in front of the hawk's cage of the London Zoo seeking to interpret the bird's movements in dance steps were the subject of many cartoons. Back in Dublin, a stable of boulevard dramatists were turning out farces and melodramas as grist for the Abbey's mill, but there was no writer on the scene who could hold a candle to Synge or Yeats.

Then a gaunt, hard-bitten former brick-layer by the a name of Sean O'Casey came forth with a savage drama about how terrorism in the streets of Dublin ripped at the lives of the people living in one particularly squalid tenement. "The Shadow of a Gunman," created a sensation, principally because O'Casey was the first post-Revolutionary Irish dramatist to deal directly with his country's struggle for independence. O'Casey's greatest play, "Juno and the Paycock," followed, and was enthusiastically received. O'Casey's portraits of the Irish possessed their share of foibles, yet they were not taken as character assassinations as were those of Synge and Yeats. For one thing, independence had been won two years before O'Casey made his debut as a playwright and Dubliners were far less sensitive than before, and for another thing O'Casey was known and respected in Dublin as a self-educated workingman, whereas Synge had been thought of as a Paris-spoiled bohemian, likely as not inspired by pro-British sympathies, and Yeats was popularly regarded as a snob who preferred the company of his monied British patrons to that of his fellow Irishmen.

When O'Casey's third major work, "The Plough and the Stars," opened at the Abbey on Feb. 8, 1926 (this is the play the Abbey is bringing to New York on Wednesday), no one in Dublin dreamed it would link O'Casey's name with Synge's. And yet, from today's perspective, it seems clear that "The Plough and the Stars" was just as provocative as "The Playboy of the Western World"—if not more so. O'Casey's drama is set during the futile Easter

'Should we expect some frenzied fisticuffs once again?'

Uprising of 1916, and the playwright's method, while sometimes referred to as tragi-comedy, is more precisely the nihilistic naturalism one associates with Gorky. Accordingly, those characters imbued with heroic patriotism are proved fools, the rank cowardice and venality of others is revealed at every turn, and indeed as one irony is piled on another it becomes apparent that O'Casey saw the real oppressor in Ireland as poverty rather than British rule. And that was too much to take for a number of newly independent zealots. The emotional rage aroused by "The Plough and the Stars" of course, was never articulate, and focused deceptivley on such irritants as the appearance on stage of a prostitute, and the carrying of the rebel flag into a bar room.

Miraculously, it seems today, the first performance of this play proceeded without incident, and the cast was given several curtain calls. O'Casey

Melanie's Back And She's Not Kissing Cow[s]

By JOHN ROCKWELL

She still looks the same—that friendly roundish face framed in bangs and long, dark hair, the body swaddled in an embroidered, Slavic-peasant long dress. She can't really be said to have retired. Yet Melanie's new album, "Photograph," and her current performances—she did a run at the Bottom Line last weekend, but she isn't really on tour yet—most definitely constitute a comeback.

In the late 1960's Melanie (née Safka, but the last name has always been vestigial) emerged as one of the more appealing flower-child folkies. Born in Astoria, Long Island in 1947, she sang at Woodstock and soon had a cult of soft, furry fans who brought gifts to her concerts, lit candles in her honor and wrote her unanswerable letters. She reached her commercial peak in 1971 with a song called "Brand New Key"—a delightful novelty number whose rise to No. 1 on the charts defied the music-business executives who had tried to commercialize her style.

But thereafter things started winding slowly downhill for her. The records kept coming, but they were uneven affairs. And as she and the decade aged, her goody-two-shoes image (one record jacket even had a photo of her kissing cows to dramatize her vegetarianism) seemed much too much. Melanie became a symbol for unhipness in a cynical pop culture that prized sophistication above all else. Lost in the imagistic shuffle and the rigid categorizations was the fact that all along, underneath the miscalculations and the self-doubt, was a superb songwriter and performer.

Today, speaking in her alluring husky conversational voice, Melanie admits doubts about her image and the way she was promoted.

"I was a vegetarian and I did do peace concerts and benefits. But the way the record company used it was obnoxious to me. I was terrified to fail in the early 1970's. I had gotten a certain amount of success in what I was doing, even with the schmaltzy kind of publicity they were putting out. I was resisting it in one way but I was also finding safety in it. I was afraid to be something else. And when you're afraid, you can't create. I needed my failure, the time when people didn't want to hear me any more. Because I realized then that it did[n't] ... died."

She Brings Duncan's Artistry Back to Life

By TOBI TOBIAS

"I am not Isadora," Annabelle Gamson retorts. Costumed in the sort of flowing Greek tunic which Isadora Duncan made famous, sweating and panting after a run-through of her reconstruction of Duncan's "Five Waltzes," Miss Gamson adds emphatically, "I simply dance her dances. I am not imitating Isadora or trying to evoke that flamboyant personality." She will be dancing her revivals of several Duncan dances, as well as her own choreography, in a solo program at Roundabout Stage One on Wednesday and next Saturday and Sunday as part of the Dance Umbrella series.

Now that her Duncan interpretations have begun to assume the proportions of a popular success, Miss Gamson is concerned lest her intentions be misunderstood. Most representations of Duncan—from the dancer's 1927 autobiography, "My Life," to several recent, colorful films—have stressed the life, rather than the art, of that creative, rebellious spirit. The Duncan who liberated dancing fades before the Isadora who defied post-Victorian convention to conduct her sexual affairs under the banner of "free love." "She shocked the world," Miss Gamson says, "and that's what we remember. We remember the legendary Isadora, whose two young children were tragically drowned in an accident; Isadora, alternately exultant and self-pitying, as the center of endless melodramatic scenes; Isadora in middle life, misused by her drunken, suicidal poet-lover, letting her body grow fat and lax—a dancer's insidious form of self-destruction; and finally the Isadora whose life was cut short when her long scarf caught in the wheels of her car, strangling her.

"I've tried to stay away from all that," Miss Gamson says. "I think all that attention to the extravagant behavior has obscured Duncan's serious accomplishment. What I'm interested in is her choreography—because it is wonderful material for the solo artist to interpret."

Duncan herself was a powerful solo artist who created her own material. Active in the first quarter of this century, primarily in France, Germany, and Russia (she was somewhat less avidly received in her native America), Duncan was a revolutionary by temperament. She rejected, vehemently, the formal restrictions of classical ballet. "The body must be taught to express itself," she proclaimed, "by means of motions which are natural to it." She sought dance that came from an inner impulse, "that dance," she declared in typically romantic language, "which would be the divine expression of the human spirit."

> "The world remembers Duncan's extravagant life,' says Annabelle Gamson, "I'm interested in her choreography."

Daring in matters of music, she choreographed to Beethoven and Wagner at a time when it was considered presumptuous for a dancer to meddle with major symphonic works. Equally daring in matters of stage attire, she released the dancer's body from the constrictions of shoes, tights, and corsets. Duncan danced barefoot, barelegged, in loose, diaphanous robes. Duncan's intensity could move observers to tears. In fact, her charisma as a performer may have overwhelmed her talents as a choreographer. Most people thought her dances were improvised, because they looked so spontaneous and passionately felt.

The nature of Duncan's legacy is debatable. She had a profound influence on the development of modern dance in America. By her example, she set dancers free—to move according to the dictates of their own bodies and sensibilities. Her work made possible subsequent achievements by innovators like Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn, Doris Humphrey, Charles Weidman and Martha Graham. This, in spite of the fact that her particular style of dancing degenerated into a long-lasting fad for "expressive dance" that consisted of young (and not so young) females wafting about in tunics in varying attitudes of emotional self-indulgence.

Many dance historians contend that Duncan had an equally profound effect on classical ballet. It has been proposed, for example, that Michel Fokine's stylistically revolutionary "Les Sylphides," with its softening of form and its emphasis on flow, and the "plastique" of "The Dying Swan" solo he devised for Anna Pavlova, owed much to Fokine's impressions of Duncan.

More directly, Duncan left behind her a select group of protégées she had adopted (giving them her surname) and trained. What remains of her choreography, which was neither notated nor filmed, exists largely through the memories of these Duncan dancers, who performed, taught, and passed the dances on to their own disciples. Two of them, Anna and Irma Duncan, taught Julia Levien who, in turn, taught Annabelle Gamson.

"I studied with Julia," Miss Gamson recalls, "from the time I was 5 until I was 12. I was a Depression child, growing up in the Bronx. My mother died when I was 4 and my father had to place me in a succession of foster homes. I remember that period in my life as a black and white film. The only color in it was dancing. I loved to move and I was good at it—a natural dancer."

Miss Gamson went on to study a variety of dance techniques and began a career as an "all-purpose performer," noted for energy, clarity, and the warmth of her stage presence. Her work ranged from a guest stint with

The United States has two giant New York City Ballet and Ame Theater—which are in the top lea national classic dance. (In the o category, America, of course, vir total dominance, although nowa companies of importance are emerging in E from these two major ballet companies, there Ballet, smaller, but also a company with inte portance, worth ranking with, say, the Stuttga a number of other companies, at present slight established and less well-known, yet also of importance. After the City Ballet, Ballet The Joffrey, perhaps the next two most important panies in the country are the Eliot Feld B Pennsylvania Ballet. (In fairness Arthur Mit Theater of Harlem is rapidly developing, and companies in the West, including Ballet West City, the San Francisco Ballet and John Cliff geles group that I, with that peculiar East Co ism, have not even seen.) Certainly the Joffrey the Pennsylvanians are fascinating young co national treasures.

To call the Joffrey Ballet a young compan misnomer. Its engagement that ended last S City Center 55th Street Theater was its 20 season, so the Joffrey is, in fact, an institution a financially endangered one.

I first met Robert Joffrey in 1955 whe London to mount two works for the Ballet Ra mediately struck me as a man who was goi enormous influence on American dance—ha right. I would not be telling this story. Howeve a remarkable tale of determination and dedica pany has known, during its 20-year history, phases, even two almost distinct incarnatio started in 1956 and ended in 1963, when its Rebekah Harkness, abruptly withdrew her sup company. As most of the dancers were under tract to her foundation, Joffrey's company dead. But it reorganized and by 1965 it was ba formances; a year later it had formed its fi with City Center. It has been a great time, and has done wonders.

This 20th-anniversary season has, in Bicentennial, featured only American choreogr is fun and has produced a number of worth from the earlier Joffrey repertory, to the exc stalwarts from the Joffrey choreographic ros Cranko, Jooss, Massine and Tudor. As a resu has given a slightly misleading impression of choreographic values. It must have sounded committee, but the season did not represent of the company's repertory. It was also unfort all of the new works were especially notable, the company was dancing as well, if not bet opular movie-making at its most stylish. It's also one of the most handsome evocations of a vanished eriod since 'Murder on the Orient Express,' and a collector's item in terms of performances. Nicol filliamson creates an entirely new Sherlock Holmes. Laurence Olivier is marvelous. The particular evelation is Robert Duvall, one of America's best actors. The initial credit must go to Nicholas Meyer hose novel is a fine piece of literary fooling, but Herbert Ross has been equally clever and disciplined realizing its screen potential. It's by far the best work he's done to date." —VINCENT CANBY, NEW YORK TIMES

ONE HUNDRED PERCENT ENTERTAINMENT! ase of an ingenious novel being turned into a terrific movie! performances glitter, especially Alan Arkin, whose Freud ouched in elegant lines, and Nicol Williamson, who is the mate Holmes. Robert Duvall is a more complex than usual tson. Vanessa Redgrave is the woman saved from the ha's passion, and Lord Laurence Olivier is a novel fessor Moriarty. A GARLAND OF CHEERS FOR 'THE VEN-PER-CENT SOLUTION,' A LEAN-BACK-AND-LOVE-IT RK THAT IS A PRACTICALLY INCOMPARABLE FAMILY M, GRAND FOR THE WHOLE FAMILY!"

—GENE SHALIT, NBC-TV TODAY SHOW

"AN INGENIOUSLY CONTRIVED SPREE.
With one of the wittiest wrap-ups of any mystery movie. Civilized light entertainment. The director, Herbert Ross, works fluidly. Movies don't often splurge on such a clever idea, and it's very pleasurable to see the casting and the details brought off without stinting. The cast... contributes to the de-luxe quality. The actors seem to be having an actors' holiday...Even bright kids—at least those over twelve—would be delighted by the way the pieces fall into place." —PAULINE KAEL, NEW YORKER MAGAZINE

"A SPEEDY, SPARKLING SPOOF.
A clever, imaginative 'further adventure' of Sherlock Holmes. Holmes is Nicol Williamson, and he's a fine choice... strong, serrating, impatient, he carries his eccentric role with flash. Olivier is Professor Moriarty—but what a Moriarty! As for Vanessa Redgrave, if there is a better English-speaking actress than she is, with a lovelier voice and face, I don't have the luck to know her. The happy surprise of the film is Alan Arkin as Freud... Both the dry wit and the adventurous sweep are well handled by the director, Herbert Ross. He has made his best film so far." —STANLEY KAUFFMANN, THE NEW REPUBLIC

PERB CAST AND INTELLIGENT SCRIPT
KE IT A WINNER! A film as witty as it is dsome, and which turns out to be one of the fall son's more entertaining diversions. The credit ngs to screenwriter Nicholas Meyer, who has cocted a sophisticated script; director Herbert Ross, had fun with his subject without condescending to nd a perfectly splendid cast."

—MORT SHEINMAN, WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY

MARVELOUS CAST CAVORTS MERRILY ROUGH 'THE SEVEN-PER-CENT SOLUTION,' WILD COMEDY IN THE SHAPE A MELODRAMA. You'll savor the acting, all of it, especially Alan Arkin as Dr. Freud, irresistibly warm human. Second, there's Nicol Williamson in a iciously mannered satire on the great Holmes. Vanessa dgrave is beautiful as a lady in distress, Robert Duvall is at as Dr. Watson." —FRANCES TAYLOR, LONG ISLAND PRESS

"A VERY HIGH CLASS CHARADE THAT NEITHER WINKS AN EYE NOR STOOPS TO SIMPLISTICS. IT CONQUERS ON ITS OWN LEVEL, AND VERY POSH AND PLEASING IT IS.
The game is that deliciously Freudian one Nicholas Meyer concocted in 'The Seven-Per-Cent Solution,' a delightful pastiche... brought to the screen by producer-director Herbert Ross not only with noteworthy elegance and taste but also with a new climactic plot. The change... has altered neither the subtleties of character nor the imaginative adventures... richly sustained in Ken Adam's production design, with London at its foggiest, Vienna at its lushest, and a lovely John Addison score to underline it all. ABOVE ALL AN EXCELLENT CAST BRINGS THIS ROMANTIC ADVENTURE TO LIFE WITH ITS LITERARY TONGUE-IN-CHEEK NUANCES INTACT AND ITS CINEMATIC POSSIBILITIES EXPLOITED TO THE FULL. Nicol Williamson and Robert Duvall bring a refreshing vigor and muscularity to the Holmes-Watson screen tradition. But there is small doubt that Alan Arkin as an energetic and activist Freud practically steals the show. The striking intelligence of his portrait is laced with humor and compassion."

—JUDITH CRIST, SATURDAY REVIEW

AN ENJOYABLE DIVERTISSEMENT...THE IDEAL ESCAPIST ROMP.

It has humor, atmosphere, wit, crackling suspense and entertaining action." —WILLIAM WOLF, CUE MAGAZINE

EGANT ENTERTAINMENT. A comic thriller with a major touch of the absurd and a ery love for its own characters and words, plus some of the scariest dream sequences ever ed. HERBERT ROSS' MOOD IS STILL BASICALLY COMIC. HE EVEN MUSTERS ITCHCOCKIAN SENSE OF STRUCTURE IN REVEALING THE STORY'S FINAL SECRET. INENTLY WATCHABLE!" —DAVID STERRITT, CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

MANDS ATTENTION! Universal has obviously spared no expense. An exceptional ernational cast... under the inventive, clever direction of Herb Ross. This film is a rare at for the eye and the ear. Holmes is played by an outrageous but irresistible Nicol liamson. The brilliant and unconventional Dr. Freud is wonderfully played by Alan Arkin. lever diversion which proves both entertaining and intellectually engaging!"

—RONA BARRETT, ABC-TV GOOD MORNING, AMERICA

"AN OUTSTANDING FILM! Herbert Ross and Nicholas Meyer have fashioned a most stylish, elegant and classy period crime drama. Nicol Williamson's Sherlock Holmes is superb, matched by Alan Arkin's Sigmund Freud and Robert Duvall's Dr. Watson. Magnificent production, superior overall casting, and brilliant execution make it one of the top films of the year. 'The Seven-Per-Cent Solution' is the kind of film that one wishes didn't end quite so soon. Well done to all hands!" —MURF, VARIETY

"AN ADVENTURE TALE TOLD WITH A DELICIOUSLY LIGHT TONGUE-IN-CHEEKINESS. AS IN LAST YEAR'S 'MURDER ON THE ORIENT EXPRESS,' THE STYLE IS EVERYTHING. THE CAST IS FLAWLESS. The plotting is so ingenious, so perfectly in keeping with the Holmes we all know and love, that it's almost as if a whole new Conan Doyle manuscript has suddenly turned up in a trunk somewhere." —ARTHUR KNIGHT, HOLLYWOOD REPORTER

"'THE SEVEN-PER-CENT SOLUTION' IS ENTERTAINMENT OF SUCH HIGH, INTELLIGENT ORDER THAT I SEE NO REASON WHY SHERLOCK HOLMES SHOULDN'T GO ON FOREVER!"

Violence—When Is It Justified?

To the Editor:

I would like to thank Mr. Canby for his excellent article, "Explicit Violence Overwhelms Every Other Value on the Screen" (Oct. 17). When I see an excessively violent film I am frightened. I am frightened by the people who enjoy it. I am frightened by the fact that there are dozens more films of this type. But, most of all, I am frightened that as I watch, I am witnessing the fall of a civilization.

STEVEN J. PUGLIESE
Smithtown, N.Y.

To the Editor

Vincent Canby blames the victims for the crimes. "Are audiences so bloodthirsty or are they simply bored?" he asks, taking the easy way out.

The hard way is to acknowledge that the movie industry, which reflects powerful forces trying to run our lives, gives us what it wants us to want until, finally, we do.

EDNA TONEY
Katonah, N.Y.

To the Editor:

Only three decades ago, the accepted purpose of literature was to "entertain and to humanize." We are today entertained by material which no longer humanizes. The cinematic revolution which has overtaken our age brutalizes us in the name of entertainment.

HELEN KRANTZ
Hempstead, N.Y.

To the Editor:

It's hard to disagree with what Vincent Canby says about the overuse and abuse of graphic violence in movies these days. It was just as hard to disagree with Bosley Crowther when he attacked "Bonnie and Clyde" for its shockingly explicit violence juxtaposed with near-slapstick. Yet I will defend "Bonnie and Clyde," "The Wild Bunch," "Psycho," "The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly," and even "Night of the Living Dead" as good—even great—films, just as eagerly as I will attack the plethora of poor films for which shock violence is an easily exploited gimmick.

Isn't the real responsibility of the critic—to himself and to his readers—to establish a set of critical criteria which will enable him to distinguish the gratuitous from the esthetically justified? It's a difficult task, but an important and necessary one, the alternative to which is the kind of supermoral out-of-hand rejection of explicit violence, an emotional reaction which would do away with the Bayeux Tapestry, "King Lear," and Goya's "Disasters of the War" and deliver us all into the hands of the Disneys.

Where Credit Is Due

To the Editor

A recent issue of The New York Times carried a still of Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn from our film, "Adam's Rib," with a caption that included the all-too-usual "George Cukor's Adam's Rib."

We respectfully suggest that it is time to abandon the so-called "Hollywood possessive" in favor of proper credit (or blame).

"Adam's Rib" was an original screenplay, conceived and executed independently and speculatively. The shooting script was bought by MGM and was subsequently brilliantly directed by George Cukor, who would surely concur in our objection to the implication that the work is his creation.

Theater coverage is more sensible. All honor to splendid directors, but one never reads references to "John Dexter's 'Equus,'" or "Elia Kazan's 'A Streetcar Named Desire,'" or "Mike Nichols's 'Streamers.'"

The dazzling editorial advances which The New York Times is making these days are innovative and fresh and progressive. May screenwriters hope for an end to the old-fashioned nonsense of assuming the film director to be the film maker? It was, after all, born in the silent days.

We have long since learned not to look for Justice in Shubert Alley, but thought that by crossing the street, we might find it in The New York Times.

FILM VIEW

VINCENT CANBY

It's Time to Hold Glenda Jackson Accountable

It's been accepted critical practice for years to express pity for actors who appear in bad movies or plays. Everybody else is responsible —never the actors. I grew up reading lofty condolences on the order of, ". . . and Sophie Lewis, one of our most talented, dazzling actresses, was trapped in the proceedings, along with everyone else in the flawless cast." Or, "Robert Forgan does the best he can with the idiotic material, though no one could have saved it." Admitedly, actors and actresses must eat. They have to support families. They have dentist bills and school tuitions to meet, and there aren't that many films or plays that they can always be choosy. Also, there are plenty of films that don't succeed in spite of the talent, taste, imagination and discipline of the people involved. Yet there comes a time when actors who've reached a certain status must share the blame. Should we shake our heads in sorrow when Gene Hackman turns up in a multi-million-dollar bore like "Lucky Lady" and suggest it's not his fault? No more. Gene Hackman was paid a bundle to make that movie and for us to feel sorry for him is ridiculous. You might as well send a CARE package to Nelson Rockefeller. Hackman made that film because he wanted to. No one held a gun to his head.

A current case in point in Glenda Jackson. Watching her as she attempts to fit her driving, powerhouse intelligence to that of a small-minded, make-believe Sarah Bernhardt in "The Incredible Sarah" is to see a film career going up in smoke. It's difficult to believe that the actress who was so affecting, witty and surprising in "Sunday Bloody Sunday," "Hedda" and "The Maids" could not have had an inkling that this match-box of a movie was not going to be as lightweight and flimsy as it turned out to be. All she had to do was to scan a synopsis and check the credits of the people involved.

In six years Miss Jackson has appeared in 12 films and won two Academy Awards, which, one would think, would give her enough room in which to maneuver so that she wouldn't be forced to prop up something like "The Incredible Sarah" in order to pay the rent. Failures come in two basic styles, honorable and totally inexcusable. Joseph Losey's "The Romantic Englishwoman" was an honorable failure. So, even, was Ken Russell's ludicrous "The Music Lovers," in which Miss Jackson played Mrs. Tchaikovsky pretty much on a bass fiddle.

However, there's no way to alibi movies like "Mary Queen of Scots" or "The Nelson Affair," great moments in history made small, or "The Devil Is A Woman," an awful Italian joke about a psychotic nun, the sort of movie that could not have lost anything in the bad English dubbing. It's time to hold Miss Jackson accountable. She isn't having a run of bad luck. She's accepting roles in junk movies that can't even be rationalized for meeting some peculiar popular taste. The movies are duds.

Something is happening to her touch. Is it dire financial need, greed, a woeful lack of judgment? Unless she pulls herself together, a serious career could be heading for the rocks. In the palmy post-"Cleopatra" days Richard Burton and his famous friend attempted to cash in on their temporary box-office appeal by seeming to accept every third script that was offered them. It nearly ruined him as well as Elizabeth Taylor, though Burton, being a great actor, had a hidden resource he couldn't easily hock. She hasn't been as lucky. It wasn't over-exposure that diluted the $1,000,000-plus per-picture fees each of the Burtons received for a while. It was over-exposure in lousy films.

Acting is a terrible business as a business. The professional life can be only slightly longer than the life of a common house fly. One can understand an actor's impulse to cash in quickly when he becomes a hot property, which is apparently what Gene Hackman did the unlucky year he appeared in "French Connection II," "Night Moves," "Bite The Bullet" and "Lucky Lady." Actually both "Night Moves" and "French Connection II" were honorable films, but Hackman is not the sort of idiosyncratic star who can expose his personality that frequently, in that short a time, without having the mediocrity of films like "Bite The Bullet" and "Lucky Lady" rub off on him.

Miss Jackson has a tougher public presence. I've never really been bored by any of her performances, even in something as silly as "The Devil Is A Woman," but her strength is beginning to look strained. Or perhaps we're starting to lose patience. I, for one, am tired of toting a lot of high expectations to a Jackson film only to wind up having to make excuses for her.

All of which leads me to a conclusion that I'd just as soon wasn't true. That is, that the $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 fees reportedly being asked by people like Steve McQueen, Paul Newman, Robert Redford and a few others may, in the long run, be the best things they ever did. It keeps them from being over-exposed, which they don't need at these junctures in their careers, and it may prompt the producers who hire them to take more care with the films these actors go into. That's never a guarantee, of course. "Lucky Lady" was a movie with big-salaried stars and it was a mistake. "The Missouri Breaks," with Marlon Brando and Jack Nicholson was, in the words of a Hollywood friend of mine, not conceived as a movie but as a production deal. Most of the effort expended in the making of "The Missouri Breaks" came from the agents and lawyers who drew up the contracts.

Even with her two Oscars, Miss Jackson is not in that salary range. If her agent should ask for $2,000,000 for a film, it's likely that no one would return his phone calls. That being the case, she, her agent, her best friend, her hairdresser, someone should suggest that she slow down, read a script before signing a commitment, and make bloody sure that she can trust the talent around her. Otherwise, curtains.

ested in Fitzgerald's notes 's speculation, the ending e been Stahr's death in a —this scene being parallel 's opening—and his trans- in a Hollywood funeral false grief. The movie end- ing—Stahr's abrupt dismissal after his clash with Brimmer—is pure confection.

Admitting to these departures, Kazan nevertheless insisted that he had penetrated to the pith of "The Last Tycoon" by concentrating on Monroe Stahr as the master and child of his Hollywood environment. Keeping the focus totally on Hollywood at work thus justifies, according to Kazan, the jettisoning of Fitzgerald's opening episode, as well as the invention of an ending that takes place in a film studio.

"This is a moving picture that looks at the inside of an interesting person, a complicated person, a confused person, a characteristic person, a gentle person," Kazan explains. "Monroe Stahr is a good businessman who had an unfulfilled desire to find romance in his life, to expand the boundaries of his life. Here's a guy who was a very tough guy, a great executive who handles all the problems of his business, but who couldn't handle the problems of his own life. When the girl [Kathleen Moore, his quasi-mistress] became not a romantic figure but a realistic person, a down-to-earth girl, he didn't know what the hell to do. That's what got him. That's what did him in. I tried to make Stahr ruthless at certain times. Other times, when he is with Kathleen, he doesn't know, he's uncertain."

Such contradictions, Kazan believes, are timeless and universal. "Everybody has contradictory things about them. Fitzgerald's Stahr still exists. The combination of commercial drive and sensitivity—that's what America is about."

Perceiving Stahr in those terms Kazan decided to minimize the 1930's. "The dresses and the cars in the movie are the only reminders of the thirties, but I didn't push it."

On the other hand, when Kazan was asked why Monroe Stahr was "the last tycoon," he explained that producers like the fictional Stahr no longer existed. "He was the last tycoon of that kind," Kazan said. "Actually, Stahr was the last of a kind that tried to make pictures that occasionally lost money, that kept a certain prestige with pictures and at the same time kept the general level of profits high. His methods of production and his tastes became outdated. That did happen. The people who are running the industry now are deal makers or lawyers or agents, no longer that old gang of Sam Goldwyn and Thalberg and even old Harry Cohn. He was a monster, but he was also a man of great artistic vanity."

Kazan emphasized that he came into the film after Pinter had written the script and after Mike Nichols, Spiegel's initial choice as director, had departed. "I liked the script Harold and Sam had formulated," Kazan said. "I made some suggestions—the ending where Stahr walks into a dark and silent sound stage—but I didn't change any of Pinter's words. I did the first cut with Harold Marks [a film editor] and then Sam and I did the rest of the editing."

Cecilia, Brady's daughter, is a film creation. As the narrator in the novel, Fitzgerald uses Cecilia as a person, several years removed from events, to describe them in detailed recollection. "We completely altered Cecilia because she is a stagey, heavyhanded method of narration," Kazan said. "She seemed to me in the novel to have Fitzgerald's brains and Fitzgerald's reactions to things, not those of a girl who had just finished three years at Bennington. So we made Cecilia into a girl who has to grow up to be the typical Beverly Hills wife of some agent. She was disappointed in the romantic love of her life, but she would become a hard-headed girl. Cecilia was the only major change in character we made."

"The Last Tycoon" is Fitzgerald's most beautifully written book," Kazan continued. "I read it many times. In translating it to the screen, I tried to keep it quiet, delicate, internal, and to stress the little things that happen between people, between their eyes. There are no villains, as I read Fitzgerald's book, and no real heroes, either. What the movie does is to go in and open up and reveal the contradictions in people's lives. There are no slug-it-out confrontations. Differences are expressed in looks, not angry words. People clash obliquely, subtly."

Stahr's fistfight with Brimmer, the union organizer, is quickly over. "This scene had little to do with Brimmer," Kazan contended. "It was all the pain in Stahr's gut over Kathleen, his frustration. Normally, he would have horse-traded with Brimmer."

Some of the movie's scenes, including the Stahr-Brimmer encounter, are lifted virtually word for word from the novel, which, according to many critics, has a filmic quality to it. Bruccoli, the Fitzgerald scholar, points out in his book that the novelist was a fairly accomplished, if erratically employed, scriptwriter in his final years. He received his only screen credit for "Three Comrades" in 1937, wrote "Infidelity," which was killed in objections from the censor, and did piece work—his ducers Day, that Scott was going to cut down. The manuscript is 37,000 words now, of which Scott would have cut about 6,000 or 7,000 words. As I wrote to Max Perkins, I could perhaps help on this in pointing out just where he had planned the cuts. Or is it better for someone who doesn't know Hollywood at all—someone who would only know what was interesting from an outsider's point of view—to do that?

This is how it was going to end.

Brady was out to ruin Stahr in the same way that at one time, and perhaps all the time, L.B. Mayer was out to wrest control of Metro from and/or to ruin Irving Thalberg. Stahr was almost kicked out and decided to remove Brady. He resorted to Brady's own gangster methods—he was going to have him murdered.

On a plane flying back to Hollywood Stahr decides not to go through with the murder which has already been planned and which other people are doing for him; if he did, he would be as bad as the Brady crowd. So at the next airplane stop he plans a cancellation of orders. I imagine the murder was to take place within a few hours. Before the next stop however, the plane crashed and Stahr is killed. Which left the murder to go through.

I think the final scene of all was to have been Stahr's funeral. And Scott was going to use an actual incident that happened at Thalberg's funeral. Harry Carey, a well known actor in the old silents and popular in the early talkies, had been unable to get a job in pictures for several years before Thalberg died. He did not know Thalberg and was surprised to receive an invitation to act as pallbearer at his funeral. It was considered a great honor and only the most important and most intimate of Thalberg's friends (all of them important) were asked to be pallbearers. Harry Carey — slightly dazed—accepted, and big shots at the funeral were amazed when they saw Carey, presuming he had an inside track of some sort with Thalberg, and as a direct result he was deluged with picture offers and has been working ever since. The invitation was a mistake and was meant for Carey Wilson.

Scott was going to have at the funeral all the Hollywood hypocrites assembled in full force. I had told him of the Marx Brothers sobbing their eyes out on the day Thalberg died—always making sure they were within crying distance of the "right" people. Scott was going to have Stahr's spirit say, "Trash!"

The English girl was to remain an outsider in Hollywood. I think one of Scott's notes has that she would never get inside a studio (although that is where Stahr first saw her on that idol floating down with the flood). Cecila, the narrator, is writing her story in a sanitarium for T.B.'s, and this, of course, would be revealed at the end.

At the point where Scott left off things were to go badly for Stahr in business and love. Many things, although in the plan, would have been changed in the same way that he deviated within the structure of the plot of what he had already written and the plan. In the plan he has the American man the English girl married a technician or something in the studio. But I think he was going to change that—make him more powerful, put him in the position of damaging Stahr.

I am coming to New York for a week at the beginning of May. Perhaps by that time something will have been decided about the manuscript. If some or all of it is published, Scott's dying won't be quite so awful. He worked hard and desperately and hopefully on the book, and it would be terribly sad if it were lost.

Sincerely:
Sheilah Graham

than just Anglo-American folk music at her roots. Safka is a Ukrainian name, and Eastern Europe was never far from her mind. Neither was a Kurt Weill kind of cabaret song; even her earliest reviews invoke Edith Piaf and Lotte Lenya. Now she's reveling in those influences more openly than ever, and adding jazz as well—all without sacrificing the idiosyncratic folk style that first brought her fame.

In performance, it all works wonderfully well, even when—as toward the end of her Bottom Line run—she's strained her voice into rawness. There's always that warmth and her phrasing to compensate, not to speak of her repository of fine songs. But how does it work on the new record?

The answer is very well indeed, thank you. Like all of Melanie's disks, this is not as insistent as it might be. Unlike some of them, there is more than enough unabashed excellence to make it well worth hearing. In all her best songs she combines a sensibility less maudlin and more perceptive than Janis Ian's with a sure kaleidoscope of styles. Works like "I'm So Blue" and "Save Me" have an evocative, introspective power in no way inferior to that of any other singer-songwriter today.

Add to that Melanie's interpretive gifts, and you have one of the finest pop records of the year. In a song called "Groundhog Day," for instance, there is a recurrent line that begins, "Take me to a party." On the page it reads innocently enough. But when Melanie sings it, it takes on connotations suggesting love, sex, loneliness, friendship and flirtation all at once. She's a marvelous performer to have back again, and one hopes that this time she will be welcomed not only by her old fans, but by new, grown-up audiences as well.

drinking and his health precluded steady employment—on such pictures as "Gone With the Wind," "Winter Carnival," "Raffles" and "Everything Happens at Night." He also wrote a still-unproduced script for his "Babylon Revisited" under the title of "Cosmopolitan."

And he worked, desperately, on "The Last Tycoon." It is impossible to know, of course, how he would have finally shaped Kathleen, about whom Mr. Kazan has explicit ideas. "My first test with Ingrid Boulting didn't come out well, but the next one did," he said, "and she did what I wanted. This was to have an apparitional quality. To be a person who floats through another's life, as must have happened to Stahr."

Remarking that he had heard varying reactions to "The Last Tycoon" from his friends, Mr. Kazan said that the movie embodied his own views of Hollywood and his own reading of the novel. "It is one person's understanding of the book, a distortion, if you will. But it is beautiful and true. It may not be literal, yet it is the spirit of Fitzgerald's novel, what he was trying to express." ■

Now, in "Network," it's a slice of media life, another view of the human condition in which television executives are shown to be greedy, or desperate, or hysterical, or terrified, or deranged, or compulsive, or immoral, or amoral, or all these things. What does surprise him, he admitted, is that a lot of television people don't seem to care for the picture.

"I thought they would love it," he said, with an absolutely straight face. "I never thought of it as an offensive statement. Some of my best friends are in television. I think Walter Cronkite and John Chancellor, for instance, are first-rate. There is no one in the cast of characters whom I don't like, as a character. These people have guts, imagination, and drive. I guess people at the networks are thin-skinned; I hear Barbara Walters hates it."

Howard Gottfried looked pained. "Not hates it, Paddy," he said. "Not hates it. She thought it was — well, exaggerated."

"I like Barbara Walters," Chayefsky mused. "She's not tricky, the way newspaper reporters sometimes are. She presses, but she doesn't provoke. Of course, she got her job because she's a terrific personality. It's just gravy that she's a good reporter."

Peter Schickele's AMERICAN HISTORY LESSON

American History Lesson is a cycle of five irreverent glances at this country's history since 1492. Together they form a unique and very funny program of musical theater in which fourteen musicians are called upon to sing, act, and even dance in addition to playing their instruments. These will be the first performances anywhere of the cycle—a new delight from the man responsible for P.D.Q. BACH. Mr. Schickele himself and the Canadian Brass are among the cast, along with sundry other musicians, singers, actors and furniture.

HELLO COLUMBUS In which an unfortunate violinist learns the rigors of 15th Century transatlantic travel.

BETTER DEAD THAN RED The story of Captain John Smith and Pocahontas, this mini-opera for keyboard group features a teepee and a rocking chair.

THE BOTTOM LINE Thomas Jefferson's inspiration for the Declaration of Independence is shown to have been musical as well as political.

HORNSMOKE Surely the world's only horse opera (and we do mean opera) for brass quintet.

actors as William Holden, Peter Finch, Robert Duvall, Beatrice Straight and William Prince, and one of the minor roles, that of a long-haired, gun-toting heiress turned revolutionary, is played by, of all people, Kathy Cronkite—Walter's daughter. What did Kathy's dad think of the picture? He said, 'I found it rather amusing," Chayefsky replied. "Walter's going to go on saying that for two reasons. One: he's a friend of Sidney's. Two: he has a job at a network."

"It's been said that Cronkite's boss at CBS News, Richard Salant, read the script, but didn't go to a screening of the picture because the script made him sick. "Thin-skinned," murmured Chayefsky, "Very thin-skinned people in television. Very sensitive, more than I thought they were. I really didn't expect this controversy. That's the truth, though it may sound like a funny truth."

Speaking of truth, he said the picture had nothing to do with real people, with any real experiences he'd had. "This is no act of retribution on my part. There is no malice in this picture, no roman à clef. I look back on my days writing for television as some of the best days of my life. Hanging around that lousy little drugstore in the NBC building, it was like a goddamned little Bohemia—Tad Mosel, Robert Alan Arthur, Ted Mann, Horton Foote. What I learned from Horton Foote, I can't begin to tell you."

Chayefsky was still in his twenties—he's 53 now—when he wrote such TV plays as "Marty," the comedy-drama about a Bronx butcher which won him his first Academy Award when it was transferred to the movies. He had to wait 16 years for his second Oscar, for "Hospital," in 1971. By that time he'd sat through a lot of poker games, and met Gottfried, who also produced "Hospital." In between, he'd written other screenplays, notably "Bachelor Party," "The Goddess," and "Middle of the Night," and a handful of stage plays, some of them well received—"The Tenth Man"—and others not well received at all—"The Passion of Josef D." But it wasn't until "Hospital" that he began to acquire a reputation as something of a satirist. "I think of myself as a social writer," he said. "The institution—whether it's a hospital, or a TV network—is representative of the society. We were not attacking medicine, and we're not attacking television, now. Television is just symptomatic of what has happened to all of us. We've become formalized, dehumanized. The film is my response as a viewer."

Satire, in its classic sense, implies an intent to change something, to improve it. Chayefsky said that's what he had in mind. "To improve something is to make it more efficient. There's no moral value involved. Moral values only work if they're functional; otherwise they're myths. The conception of 'Network' is a farce, but once the idea is there, it's all real, every bit. I don't attack; I just tell the truth. Television will do anything for a rating. Anything!"

His next work will be a satire on the scientific community. "We will explore what it means to be a human being," Chayefsky said. "When you strip away, all the nonsense, and get right down to the nucleus, what is that nucleus? I think it'll be a startling film." He said he's been it a while, following a on on yellow paper taped to his desk. He likes to w to talk. For Earl Wild, Music Shouldn't Sound Difficult

By STEPHEN E. RUBIN

Because Earl Wild has made playing the piano both look and sound easy, he has been perpetually misunderstood. Looks aren't everything, and now Wild, at age 60, is attempting to set the record that he is neither a heartputer capable of nothing but owess nor a feather brain atly to frivolous music.

fall dead in front of the TV set when I hear such things from musicians who try to be intellectual and are not."

Wild presents a sober, stationary and purposefully untheatrical demeanor during a concert. "I was raised in that school," he explains. "Hofmann and Rachmaninoff, two of my favorites, never flailed when they played the piano. The first time I heard Egon Petri play I was absolutely floored. He made a crescendo while he was in the middle of a piece by hardly moving a muscle in his hands, and it sounded like somebody was shoveling sound onto the audience. I studied with him, and he changed my entire approach to the piano. I had played with high fingers before, very clear, but not much body of sound. In one lesson, he cured me of that.

"The ear has to be placed at the end of the fingers. The minute you start to use extra motion, what you are trying to project to the fingers goes into another spot, the shoulders or the neck."

Wild, the decorous public personality, is something of a droll pixy in private, and if it weren't for his superlative manners and floppy white hair, he could almost pass for a Damon Runyon character parading around in elegant dress. He is noted for a quick wit, affable personality and salty language. Once when he was practicing on the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand for a Tanglewood performance with Erich Leinsdorf, both musicians were horrified to discover that the amplified instrument managed to obliterate the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf predicted scandal and disaster. Wild assured him the piano could be regulated to sound quite natural, and that he wouldn't play it until it was. Came the performance and both men were backstage and about to walk out, Leinsdorf looking particularly worried, when his soloist winked at him and said, "Don't mess with me maestro, or I'll drown ya out."

Wild's dual personality is perhaps best explained by the fact that he has been playing the piano since he was four, and been on the entertainment scene since he was 13. Just as one is always taken back to discover a decidedly down-to-earth streak in Mozart's nonprofessional personality, so is one startled to hear this patrician and very

Two Late-19th-Century French Operas Coming Up This Week

This is a season of French opera, and two of them are coming up this week, both for the first time in New York. "Le Roi Malgré Lui" by Emmanuel Chabrier will be presented by the Juilliard American Opera Center on Thursday, to be followed the next evening by Joan Sutherland and her cohorts in "Esclarmonde" by Jules Massenet. Chances are that the Massenet will be completely unknown to most listeners at the Metropolitan Opera, though those will be a few who heard the opera with Sutherland in San Francisco. At least one section of "Le Roi" will be familiar, for Balanchine (who is choreographing the work for the Juilliard) used the long "Fête Polonaise" in his popular ballet, "Bourrée fantasque."

Two more dissimilar operas will be hard to find. "Esclarmonde" is the product of a skilled composer who knew all the tricks and especially knew how to satisfy his public. Massenet mixed sex and religion, and his audiences had the deliciously naughty feeling of participating in approved sin. Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, once snorted that Massenet's music was nothing but an "érotisme discret et quasi-religieux." Those who have that comment in mind while looking at the score of "Esclarmonde" may be amused by the many "andante religioso" directions throughout the opera.

Massenet pretended to high seriousness. Chabrier was different. He was in many respects a self-taught composer, one of the real originals of music, who raised wit and irreverence to the point of an esthetic principle. His compositional career did not last much more than 10 years. He had studied music as a child, but because of parental pressure took a law degree and entered the Ministry of the Interior. For years he plodded along. In the late 1870's he composed two comic operas, "L'Etoile" and "Une Education Manquée." Then his friend Henri Duparc, the great song composer, took him to Munich to hear "Tristan und Isolde." The experience was so overwhelming that Chabrier in 1880 left the Ministry to concentrate on music.

He only had a short career after that. In 1891 he came down with cerebral paralysis and lingered for three more years, unable to work, until he died in 1894. He left four operas and an unfinished one named "Briseis," some marvelously sophisticated songs and piano pieces, and an art collection that contained, among other things, 11 Manets, 8 Monets, 6 Renoirs and 2 Sisleys. Chabrier had moved in that circle. He also was close to the literary group. Two of his closest friends were Zola and Verlaine.

Throughout his life he had very little money. Massenet was a millionaire. In many respects he was the French Puccini. He adored and understood women, as Puccini did, and many of his operas center around some kind of voluptuous sex symbol. Manon, Thais, Esclarmonde, Cendrillon, Salome . . . And many of his 25 operas were written with certain women in mind.

"Esclarmonde" is one of those. Massenet had been working on it for several years when he met the American soprano Sybil Sanderson. He was bowled over by her beauty and her three-octave range. "I was astonished, stupefied, overcome," he later wrote in his memoirs. It was an item of belief that she had an affair with him. But that was said of many of Massenet's sopranos. If he did have an affair with the beauteous Sybil, it must have been on the fly. Her mother accompanied her wherever she went—especially when she visited Massenet at his country place. Mama knew best.

The plot of "Esclarmonde" is drawn from an old French romance. A Byzantine king will give his daughter's hand to the victor of a tournament. But Esclarmonde is in love with a French knight named Roland, whom she has only seen from afar. Esclarmonde is a sorceress, and she casts a spell to get Roland to a magic island. She cannot unveil her face, and she exacts a promise from Roland that he will never reveal the circumstances of their betrothal. Of course he does, under harrowing circumstances, and she has to forswear him just as Lohengrin has to forswear Elsa. But there is a happy ending.

When "Esclarmonde" had its premiere in 1889 it was accused of being Wagnerian. A big orchestra is used, there are leit-motifs, and even, here and there, fleeting hints of "Tristan" and "Parsifal." But one has to look for those derivations. The score is prime Massenet full of that "érotisme discret et quasi-religieux."

It actually starts with religious music on the solo organ —strange sounds to be coming from a Byzantine court. The writing throughout is extremely sensuous. Right at the beginning there is the unusually rich Esclarmonde-Parseis duet. Another example would be the lazy langour of the Esclarmonde-Roland love duet in Act II (this is one of the few spots in the opera where the second act of "Tristan" can be felt). The role of Esclarmonde is difficult. Not only does it have some tricky coloratura passages, with a range that goes to E flat above the C; it also calls for dramatic singing in the lower registers. The tenor has it somewhat easier; his role does not go above B.

"Le Roi Malgré Lui" was composed at much the same time as "Esclarmonde"; it had its premiere at the Opéra-Comique on May 18, 1887. It is a comic opera, set in Poland, about a French nobleman who for reasons of state has to ascend the Polish throne, a prospect he views with loathing. (The Juilliard is presenting the work in English and calling it "The Reluctant King.") So he desperately maneuvers to get out of it—until he finds a lady love with whom he had had an affair in Venice. She is married to an Italian courtier at the Polish court. At the time of their hasty affair they had not known each others' identity. All kinds of complications ensue until the two sets of lovers (there is a subsidiary romance between another couple) work things out.

Chabrier knew his Offenbach, and there are Offenbachian patches throughout "Le Roi." But Offenbach never had the imagination of Chabrier, whose harmonies are years in advance of his day. Many history books say that Satie was the father of Les Six, the group that came to prominence in Paris after World War I. But Satie admitted his debt to Chabrier, Poulenc (one of Les Six) called him his "spiritual grandfather," and Ravel also paid tribute. In the waltzes of the "Fête Polonaise" one can hear all kinds of anticipations of Ravel's "La Valse."

The Chabrier waltzes are remarkable for their period—brilliantly orchestrated, tart, full of unusual dissonances, and with a unique type of melody. There is no real precedent for this kind of music. As Chabrier himself said, he belonged to no school. "I am virtually self-taught . . . . I had more

It must have been quite an evening, judging from all reports, with everyone basking in the presence of an unprecedented collection of luminaries. As is so often the case with such gala affairs, the event would probably have been better left a nostalgic memory, for without the festive trappings the music-making on these two disks sounds pretty spotty.

The opener, Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 Overture with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Philharmonic, turns out to be a rather scrappy reading; Vladimir Horowitz, Isaac Stern and Mstislav Rostropovich run off in three directions at once in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Piano Trio; and it would be best to draw a veil of charity over Yehudi Menuhin's contribution to Bach's Concerto for Two Violins with Stern and Bernstein. Rostropovich and Horowitz do collaborate on an exquisite statement of the slow movement from Rachmaninoff's Cello Sonata, and Horowitz's accompaniment for Schumann's "Dichterliebe" song cycle is full of illuminating details, even if he and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau rarely agree on the same tempo. It all seems to prove that too many virtuosos in one place more often than not leads to a musical tug of war.

The Heifetz-Piatigorsky Concerts; Columbia M 33447. Perhaps because he was such a modest interpreter, Heifetz always seemed to fit smoothly within a chamber music context. Here, he and the late Gregor Piatigorsky generate a good deal of visceral excitement in three duos—Stravinsky's "Suite Italienne," a trifle by Glière and a Handel arrangement by Halvorsen—and, with pianist Leonard Pennario, they turn in a suave performance of Dvorák's Op. 65 Piano Trio.

Vladimir Horowitz: The Horowitz Concerts, 1975-76; RCA ARL 1-1766. If Horowitz felt mistreated by RCA when he left the label 15 years ago, all has been rectified for his return: a luxurious double-fold album with raised gold lettering and a disk containing two of his currently favored repertory items, the Schumann Third Sonata and Scriabin's Fifth Sonata recorded during his concert tours last season—a red-carpet treatment accorded only to super-virtuosos.

The performances deserve no less. Horowitz presents the Schumann with almost more feverish intensity than the music can take, but his bronzen tone and powerfully articulate fingerwork bring out a myriad of absorbing details. The Scriabin is staggering: the piercing, nervously shifting chordal sonorities and subtle rubato effects project the hallucinatory, incantational nature of this disturbing music with extraordinary physi al immediacy.

Lazar Berman: Beethoven Sonatas Nos. 18 and 23 (Columbia M 34218); Liszt Piano Concertos Nos. 1 and 2; Vienna Symphony, Carlo Maria Giulini, cond. (Deutsche Grammophon 2530 770). Berman, for all his awesome technical equipment, hardly seems to be in tune with Beethoven's piano sonatas. The mischievous E flat Sonata eludes him completely in this gruffly earnest performance, while the "Appassionata" sounds like so much empty clatter. The two Liszt concertos are something else again—warmly phrased, dazzling precise, this is high Romantic pianism of the first order, elegantly supported by Giulini's refined orchestral textures.

Mstislav Rostropovich: Shostakovich Cello Concerto No. 2; Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa, cond. (Deutsche Grammophon 2530 653); Haydn Cello Concertos in D and C; Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields (Angel S 37193). Rostropovich unfortunately seems to be gradually deserting the cello for the conductor's podium, where he has so far proven, on disks at least, to be willful, erratic and technically insecure. These records, however, reinforce his position as today's premiere cellist. The Shostakovich Concerto, written for him serious pianist tell of his extraordinary background.

"My family lived in Pittsburgh and had an old Edison phonograph and an upright piano. They used to play overtures to operas like 'Norma,' and at the age of four, I would reach up to the piano and find the same notes and play them in the same rhythm. That was the reason they gave me lessons then. By the time I was six, I could play and read, and I still perform some of the pieces now which I played when I was eight. So when I look back, it seems like a long, long time.

"I have absolute pitch. I can take any kind of dictation, write anything on the page I hear. I have a very good ear, and I can also improvise like crazy. As a youngster, I learned to make arrangements of things for piano and small orchestra, and used to take them around to the local radio station because it was a way in. I got my first job at 13. Whenever the station needed something fancy, they would ask me to play it."

When he was 18, a visitor to the station was impressed with young Earl's ability and offered him a job with NBC in New York. Thus began the extension of Wild's broadcasting career. He did arrangements for the program "Colonel Stoopnagle and Bud," and earned $350 a week—"quite a bit of dough for those days." The first time he played the piano was with Walter Damrosch conducting, and the piece was "The Dance of the Sugar-plum Fairy." Two weeks later, he played the celeste in "Ibéria" under Toscanini. He was a staff pianist in the same way that the NBC Symphony was a staff orchestra. He played his share of junk just like the legendary orchestra played gypsy music.

Wild remained at NBC for 8 years, until he saw the handwriting on the wall, that when the Maestro left, Camelot would fade away, which is exactly what happened. After returning from the Navy in 1944, he joined the newly formed American Broadcasting Company and remained there as a staff musician until 1968.

During his years with both broadcasting giants, Wild often concertized outside of the studio—including a Town Hall debut in 1944—but he never pursued the career of a concert artist because he couldn't take the risk of losing a regular income to support both his mother and himself. "But it was dignified work," he laughs, "we weren't subjected to any cruelties."

He was and is, however, subjected to prejudice. "People still mistrust those of us who worked commercially," Wild reports. "Actually we are much wiser in many respects. I've had the experience of playing almost everything there is in music plus endless chamber music things, which very few people know is in my background. Even in the last years at ABC, we had FM broadcasts every week of all the major popular chamber works."

Those mistrustful souls would probably never speak to Wild again if they knew he was on Sid Caesar's staff from 1952-56, and contributed to many of the musical jokes in which the comic often engaged. Wild was in splendid company—Neil Simon, Carl Reiner, Mel Brooks and Paddy Chayefsky were among his creative colleagues.

Wild also tried writing several musical comedies. "One concerned the fire department, and was about the transition from horses to trucks. Billy Rose considered producing it three times. It was a good show, but much too expensive to mount."

As well as composing both light and serious music, Wild had often conducted, but decided in 1961 that it was too late to learn the repertory and sadly laid down his baton forever. The last performances he led were at the Santa Fe Opera — four "Gianni Schicchis" on a double bill with Stravinsky conducting "Oedipus Rex," and seven "Traviatas."

"I finally decided I loved the piano so much I just wanted to play it for the rest of my life," Wild recalls. "After all, I was a pianist from the beginning." In 1968, came another one of those revelations. After leaving ABC, Wild decided for the first time to devote himself exclusively to concertizing. He went to both London and South America and developed broad followings. At home, however, there were biases to overcome which, in part, were deep rooted.

"After I played the 'Rhapsody in Blue' with Toscanini in 1942, I woke up the next morning to find that I was suddenly a Gershwin expert, even though I didn't know any of the other pieces—the concerto, the preludes, nothing. I only learned the 'Rhapsody' to play it with Toscanini because he asked me to. In 1956, RCA asked me to record a number of the Gershwin pieces with Arthur Fiedler. We became marvelous friends, and he asked me to play everywhere with him which was terribly nice."

A year later, Wild made "The Virtuoso Piano" for Vanguard, containing a lot of previously unrecorded music, geared to take advantage of the oncoming Romantic Revival. He also recorded "The Demonic Liszt" and other albums for Vanguard, as well as two highly romantic works for RCA—the Paderewski and Scharwenka piano concertos.

Given the coincidence of becoming an overnight Gershwin authority, of his close association with the dean of "light" music, Arthur Fiedler, and of his identification with the overtly pianistic, salon music of the Romantic era, Wild has gotten a bad name in some serious circles.

"I know it," the musician agrees, "and I know that I have to create the demand to hear me play the music I haven't performed here. I played my first Brahms B flat Concerto in this country only last year. I have never played the 'Emperor' Concerto, except with the U.S. Navy in 1942. I want to play the Chopin F minor Concerto, which I love. I want to show what I can do."

While Wild is eager to commence this new stage in his life—as a traditional concert artist—he is relaxed, secure and not itching to scratch his way to stardom. He believes good things will come to him — starting before Christmas when the new Quintessence label will release performances of his which have developed a considerable following among piano fanciers and were previously available only by mail order. There will also be newly recorded material coming later—like Wild's own 25-minute fantasy on themes from "Porgy and Bess," which he describes as "mad and Godowsky-esque."

"I am a romantic who has always done what he wanted to do because he took pleasure in it," Wild says of himself. "I think sometimes I bring a fresh look, a fresh light to what I play. So much of what we hear is imitation, without conviction—what the pianists think is proper. Oftentimes what is proper is so boring. But I don't do things just to be different. I know that people like Glenn Gould do, and I think it shows a great lack of inner strength.

"I have reached the point where there is a culmination of the things I feel; I have gathered a great deal of experience. You know, I've practiced the 'Hammerklavier' for years. I practice it, put it away, come back to it, put it away again. Each time, technically, it becomes easier. It never really gets easy, but at least you can think about what the sound is, what is happening while you play. You must have that marvelous edge where you are conscious of what you're doing, but have enough detachment so you can listen to it like someone else.

"It's like Nirvana when that happens, but it takes a tremendous amount of practice and work to achieve that balance. When I do something now, I know quite well what it is and why I'm doing it. That's the reason to play. So I am going to pursue a concert career." ■ temperament than talent. There are many things that one must learn in youth that I shall never reach; but I live and breathe music, I write as I feel."

19th Century French Opera

Had he wanted to, Chabrier could have turned out operas as sensuous as any of Massenet's. In one of them, "Gwendolyn," Chabrier wrote some music that overheats the auditorium. This is supposed to be Wagner-inspired, and the libretto is, but not the music, which is intensely French. In "Le Roi Malgré Lui," there are things like the Minka-Henri duet of Act I, or the ravishing Barcarolle of Act II (not patterned after the famous "Tales of Hoffmann" barcarolle), that are as sexy as anything in French music. But Chabrier's inclination ran the other way. He had the authentic light touch, and that interested him more than the heroics of grand opera.

"Le Roi Malgré Lui" is a long opera. Presumably Julliard will be cutting some of it, especially the long stretches of dialogue. Perhaps this production will attract attention to other Chabrier operas, especially "L'Etoile," which had a student performance at the Mannes College of Music a few years ago (if one remembers correctly, a young mezzo-soprano named Frederica von Strade took over the stage at that production). The libretto of "L'Etoile" is pretty bad — Gilbert and Sullivan gone haywire—but the music is wonderful. Anyway, at long last, we are getting "Le Roi Malgré Lui" if for only three performances — Thursday and Saturday evenings, and next Sunday afternoon. It should be an experience not to be missed.

in 1966, is by turns brooding, playful, introspective and enigmatic in the nature of the composer's last works, but Rostropovich plays it with brilliant control, gorgeous tone and total commitment. The Haydn concertos are graciously stylish and classically scaled as befits this civilized music.

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau: 19 Ives Songs; Michael Ponti, piano; Deutsche Grammophon 2530 696. Since Fischer-Dieskau sings everything, an Ives disk was only a matter of time. The results are extremely variable, partly because the baritone is not really into the idiom—his smoothly cultured approach and slightly tinged accent seem at odds with Ives's earthy directness—and partly because several songs lie uncomfortably for his voice. The three set to German texts are among the predictable successes, as are quiet, reflective, gentle lyrics such as "Two Little Flowers" which benefit from Fischer-Dieskau's suave legato line. The more declamatory songs sound rather self-conscious, though, the worst of them being "From the 'Swimmers,'" which is little more than a pitchless gabble.

Artruo Toscanini: The Philadelphia Recordings, 1941-42; RCA CRM 5-1900. Twenty years after his death, Toscanini still fascinates—in America, at least, his name has become virtually synonomous with the word "conductor." The recordings on these five disks have acquired a further legendary status over the years, for only one of them, the Schubert Ninth Symphony, has ever been made available to the public before. Presumably the masters, due to various technical deficiencies, had been judged unlistenable at the time they were recorded. Whatever electronic wizardry has been performed here, the sound is now fully representative of its time and what emerges from the grooves reveals yet another vital musical facet of the Maestro.

The Philadelphia Orchestra in 1941, a group trained by Stokowski and Ormandy, was a very different kind of ensemble from Toscanini's NBC Symphony, and the performances here have a warmth and instrumental sheen missing from the conductor's familiar NBC recordings. That coupled with Toscanini's proverbial kinetic energy, iron discipline and taut phrasing yield stunning reults in nearly every piece. In addition to the Schubert, the album contains Debussy's "La Mer" and "Iberia," Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream music, Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo, Respighi's "Feste Romane" and Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung"—Toscanini specialities all, and heard here in an intriguing new light.

Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic: Bruckner Symphony No. 8 (Deutsche Grammophon 2707 085); Verdi Overtures (Deutsche Grammophon 2707 090); Mozart Requiem (Deutsche Grammophon 2530 765); Liszt Hungarian Rhapsodies Nos. 4 and 5 and Tasso (Deutsche Grammophon 2530 698); Music of Johann Strauss (Angel S 37144); Strauss Don Quixote and Ein Heldenleben (Angel S 37057 and S 37060). Karajan's cool search for executional perfection, a quality in evidence right from the beginning of his career in the 30's, has always marked him as a Toscanini disciple, although over the years his super-refined interpretations have created an image that is most assuredly his very own.

Karajan must be the most prolific recording conductor on the scene today and hardly a month passes without a batch of new releases covering a wide spectrum of music from Bach to Webern—the list above gives just a hint of his range. The pick of the current lot is undoubtedly the Bruckner Eighth, a performance of massive power, majesty and structural insight. The complete collection of Verdi's overtures and preludes makes a useful compendium and contains several rarities. Possibly Karajan has smoothed out much of the young Verdi's raw vitality, but they are stunningly played. Mozart's Requiem gets the de luxe, glossy treatment that brings out the worst side of this conductor, an approach better suited to the disks devoted to Liszt and Strauss (Johann and Richard). In each case one hears what makes Karajan unique among today's conductors: the Berlin Philharmonic is literally his instrument which he can control with the flick of a finger in much the same way a Horowitz commands total authority over a concert grand piano.

Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic perform in Carnegie Hall tonight.

Georg Solti and the Chicago Symphony; Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony (London CS 6983); Strauss Also Sprach Zarathustra, Till Eulenspiegel, Don Juan (London CS 6978). Solti, another conductor schooled in the Toscanini tradition, is a musician whose reputation seems based more on gut excitement than a perceptive musical point of view. With Karajan and the Berliners there is no question about who is in charge, but sometimes one wonders who is leading who in Solti's Chicago recordings.

The Tchaikovsky Fifth is just such a performance—rigid, graceless, vapid, passionless and finally pointless for all its instrumental brilliance. The generously filled Strauss album is better, but on the whole the Solti-Chicago phenomenon seems more like virtuosity used as an end in itself. ■ himself felt that on opening night the applause "flowed from the serenity of agreement with, and appreciation of the play."

The Abbey Theater's Riot-Provoking Dramas

On the second night, there were several vocal protests from the audience. When the Plough and the Stars was carried into a barroom a member of the audience shouted, "That flag was never taken into a public house!" and stamped out of the theater. Several insults were also hawked at the actress playing a prostitute, but the play was able to be performed despite these interruptions. By the time of the third performance, objectors to the play converged on the theater in force and loudly denounced the prostitute as soon as she appeared on stage and again protested the presence of the flag in a barroom.

In the middle of the third act, about a dozen women who had just returned from a patriotic Poppy Day celebrat on suddenly forced their way into the theater and marched up to the front of the house, attempting to climb onto the stage. Hot-blooded members of the audience joined them. All pretense of acting stopped immediately as the actors employed chairs, scenery and their fists to defend the stage. One young man jumped up on the stage and attempted to strike an actress, but Barry Fitzgerald, perfectly in character as Fluther Good, intervened with a punch that sent the young man sprawling back into the orchestra pit.

O'Casey's own recollection of the event, written 23 years after the fact, verges on the fantastic:

"Rowdy, clenching, but well-groomed hands reached up to drag down the fading black-and-gold curtains; others, snarling curiously, tried to tug the very chairs from their roots in the auditorium; while some in frenzy, pushed at the stout walls to force them down."

Whatever actually took place in the theater, the fact is O'Casey himself soon retreated to the box office where he was cornered by Yeats who asked for his permission to call the police. Grudgingly, O'Casey consented and strolled around to the stage door. For a time, the tide of battle had turned against the actors as the women fought their way onto the stage. Just at this point, however, the stage manager rang down the curtain, trapping the women on stage and, with the help of a few stage hands, the actors pitched and poked the screaming women, one by one, out the stage door. There, to their amazement as they tumbled out and picked themselves up, the women came face to face with Sean O'Casey, coldly glaring at them. Most of the women apologized, and meekly began asking questions about the play. One of them even challenged O'Casey to a pubic debate.

Meanwhile, on stage, Yeats was about to declaim what has since become an often-quoted oration. The audience roared when they saw him. Yeats put up his hands to hush them but they roared even louder. Then he tried to speak, but no one could hear him, because of the stamping and shouting and booing. Yeats had anticipated this reception and had already supplied a local newspaper office with a copy of his speech so that there would be no mistaking what he had to say. His speech was published the following day:

"Dublin has once more rocked the cradle of a reputation. From such a scene as this went forth the fame of Synge. Equally, the fame of O'Casey is born here tonight. This is his apotheosis."

As soon as Yeats sat down the police arrived and order was restored. The play was acted through and was wildly applauded and booed at the end.

> 'O'Casey saw the real oppressor in Ireland as poverty rather than British rule. And that was too much for the zealots.'

When the Abbey opens its tour with "The Plough and the Stars" Wednesday night, should we expect some frenzied fisticuffs once again? Not likely. However suspect as pro-British the Abbey may have been in its early days, it eventually became the first theater in the world to receive a government subsidy, and today the Abbey is the national theater of Ireland—a museum in which O'Casey's eminence is about as much subject to question as St. Patrick's in the Church. The real danger for the Abbey Theater today, according to a recent report from Dublin which appeared in these pages, is more insidious—apathy, not anger.

Still, there is a virtue in the neutrality in which the Abbey is held today. After all, O'Casey did not write "The Plough and the Stars" as a manifesto, nor certainly to pick a fight. His play is intended as a work of art. At last, it can be seen by an American audience with all the authenticity which a native production can bring to it, and may be viewed with the detachment which, better than anything else, will test the playwright's greatness. ■

DANCE VIEW

Jackson particularly shone, is a useful classic work for a company that needs such challenges. "Rodeo," which seemed to have a more robust air than it has in its Ballet Theater version, suited the Joffrey perfectly. The dancers looked totally at home on the range, and it was nice to see the restoration of Kermit Love's original costumes.

The "Orpheus" piece was horrid. Set to pretentious pseudo-modern music by José Serebrier, this was the first retelling of the Orpheus legend in my experience where it seemed that Orpheus had a cozier personal relationship with the male Angel than with Eurydice. Sometimes Arpino has his dancers grappling a little too much for choreographic fulfillment. When Arpino is good, he is very good; when he is not, he stages works such as "Orpheus Times Light."

Tharp is more consistent. Indeed, sometimes she seems too consistent, always repeating the same manner of choreography to slightly different music. In fact, it is not the same choreography she is repeating, but merely the same attitude to movement, the same humor and the same dramatic dynamics. She is a master of the camp, of the irreverent, of the expectedly visual unexpected. Her dislocations of movements, her freneticism, her unisexuality, her pseudo-toughness, her cool and her cute naughtiness are all very contemporary. Sometimes they seem contrived and sometimes spontaneous. It may depend, in part, on the mood of the spectator as well as his sensibility.

By the time I saw "Happily Ever After," which is intricately interwoven with monotonous country-and-western music, it had been considerably cut, but still seemed overlong. I liked Marie de Angelo very much in a mildly conventional, yet off-beat solo, and a final ensemble was rather fun. Although this did not seem to be Tharp at her best, it obviously delighted her staunchest admirers.

The Feld Ballet has also not produced anything particularly original in its season that ends next week at the Public Theater. Yet, it did extend the repertory with one premiere, a solo for the Stuttgart guest artist Birgit Keil, and three revivals new to the company—"A Soldier's Tale" and "A Poem Forgotten" by Feld and "Waves" by Kathryn Posin.

The solo, "Impromptu," was set to music by Albert Roussel, and had an imaginative setting (like the framework of a twisted, inverted umbrella) by Ming Cho Lee. Miss Keil (who like her partner, Vladimir Klos, appeared to advantage in other roles in the Feld repertory) looked lovely, and Feld has precisely caught the unfolding legato quality of her dancing. Of the revivals, Posin's "Waves," which had something of the intensity and authority of Doris Humphrey's "Water Study," proved fascinating, as did Feld's own restaging of his sardonic essay in German expressionism, "A Soldier's Tale." I was altogether less happy about his seeming obscurantist "A Poem Forgotten." One of Feld's major qualities is choreographic clarity, even when, as rarely happens, he is not telling a direct story. But here even the interesting movements seemed enveloped in a pall of mystery that was not only impenetrable but also, in effect, annoying.

The Feld company is dancing very well at present. It has absorbed its losses in personnel and acquired some striking personalities, such as Edmund LaFosse. The Pennsylvania Ballet, on one of its biannual pilgrimages to the Brooklyn Academy of Music a few weeks ago, also looked in good fettle. It gave two programs—both with New York premieres—but regrettably I was able to catch only one performance. I enjoyed Hans van Manen's "Adagio Hammerklavier," a classic work of compelling interest. For the rest of the program, I preferred the modest genre approach of Rodney Griffin's "Eakin's View," one of those few ballets seriously inspired by a painter, to the more obscurely influenced work by Benjamin Harkarvy called "For Fred, Gene and M.G.M.," which seemed a nice title in search of a ballet. For the record, the other new works given during this all too brief season were Gene Hill Sagan's "Sweet Agony," Harkarvy's "Four Men Waiting," and Margo Sappington's "Under the Sun."

So there you have it. Three companies, all very different and yet all expressing eloquently the new vitality of the classic American dance. Even without New York City Ballet and American Ballet Theater—and God forbid that!—New York is a pretty exciting town for classic ballet.

Annabelle Gamson: "Isadora Duncan's dances spring from the gut."

Ballet Theater as the spunky cowgirl in "rodeo" to Broadway, TV, and the modern dance concert stage. Later, during an extended "retirement phase," she taught, choreographed, stage directed for the opera, married, and raised a family. At intervals she found herself thinking about the Duncan dances.

"I called Julia and asked her to teach me some of the material, and she did. We'd go into the studio and she'd show the movement to me and then I'd follow along behind her. Later, when I decided to try to perform the dances publicly, she gave me two or three splendid coaching sessions. Of course, the real work has to be done on your own. Duncan solos are like folk forms. You learn the outline and then you have to fill them up with yourself, discover yourself in the dances, give them texture, timbre. The more I explored Isadora's works the more wonderful I thought they were—minimal dances that manage to say everything, with economy and depth. They're not highly technical pieces. They're intuitive dances. They spring from the gut—from the simple, human instinct to move."

Critics agree that the vocabulary of Duncan dancing is elementary, but the style obstinately difficult to capture. "These dances are not easy to do," Miss Gamson observes. "Why? Because they're so simple. Simple is hard." The "Five Waltzes," to Brahms, are filled, characteristically, with running and skipping motions; overcurves and undercurves; ebullient springs into the air; soft, heavy drops to the floor. Rightly done, they create the image of a human completely in tune with itself and its environment.

A pair of Scriabin études on the Roundabout program, "Mother" and the "Revolutionary" study, are remarkable for their starkness and compression. In the first, a Niobe figure conveys nurturing love and inconsolable loss through images as plain as rocking, a curved torso, an outstretched arm. The revolutionary figure, fists clenched, mouth wide open in a soundless yell, seems to rip her limbs away from gravity's pull. These dances deal in basic, often literal, gestures and primal emotions—elements that might easily lend themselves to the banal or the overwrought—yet their effect is, surprisingly, both abstract and profoundly moving.

As critics have remarked, the strength of Miss Gamson's performance lies in the fact that she strips all three dances of the decoration, sentiment, or bombast that might easily adhere to them, revealing the effective power of Duncan's choreography.

Why take the risk of submerging her own choreography in her performance of Duncan's? "Because," she says, "these early dances have simple, resonant qualities we've lost. They deserve attention. They are a terrific addition to a soloist's repertory. And that's what my own career is about now—the solo situation. There's just you, in the huge space of the theater, attempting to carry the audience with you. I don't care about the 'legendary' Isadora, but I do care about keeping alive choreography that lets you do that."

Recently Miss Gamson has added two solos by Mary Wigman, the German dance pioneer, to her repertory. Wigman is a witch-like figure in modern dance, associated with dances that deal with the darker emotions and subjects like death. Using film of Wigman performing, interpreted with the aid of the Dance Notation Bureau and the coaching of Wigman's most illustrious disciple, Hanya Holm, Miss Gamson has reconstructed "Pastoral" and "Dance of Summer" from Wigman's 1929 "Shifting Landscape." These are surprisingly lyric studies, built with delicate, finely structured movement, that evoke an intense impression of landscape and feeling.

Duncan and Wigman. What is the connection between the two early, radical dancemakers Miss Gamson has chosen to revive? "Their dances are dances of ecstasy" she answers promptly. "And I'm interested in that." ■ serious plays as well as musicals discovered themselves in surprising demand. The fresh zest is still there: if "Porgy and Bess" is playing to enough people to gross better than $200,000 a week, "For Colored Girls" is doing extremely well, too—and "For Colored Girls" is a decidedly more experimental proposition. The climb hasn't ended.

But if we clearly have a new and eager audience, we don't have the new playwrights ready-made to serve it, supply it, keep it coming. Thus far theatergoers have contented themselves, for the most part, with British importations and a wide variety of revivals. But a moment will undoubtedly arrive when we either match the avidity of audiences with a fresh productvity on stage or run the risk of losing that audience once more out of ennui. The compliment must be returned.

At the moment there's a gap between an appetite and its full satisfaction. To a degree, this has always been the case. Producer emeritus Max Gordon has been pointing out for years that the theater is the one institution in the world that has more customers available than it has merchandise on the shelves. But the issue is more acute just now because for a time those available customers had wandered off elsewhere; like the prodigal son, they've just recently come home; unlike the prodigal son, they haven't been greeted with a fatted calf.

In effect, we've got to get a calf—a dozen calves—on the spit, and in a hurry. All hail to the cooks who are rushing the job.

"RAISIN"—Virginia Capers stars in the musical at Newark's Symphony Hall, Tuesday through Nov. 21.

The New York Times Large Type Weekly

Many people with the greatest curiosity about the world have difficulty reading the print in a daily newspaper.

So they just skim the headlines. Or they give up reading newspapers altogether.

Perhaps there are people like this in your family or among your friends who really miss the chance to read and absorb the news in depth as they did in the past.

For them, The New York Times publishes the Large Type Weekly, a weekly newspaper with words more than twice the size of regular newspaper print—as big as some headlines.

Make this test

See for yourself what a remarkable difference large print makes. Hold this page at full arm's length and read the paragraphs below:

This is regular size print used in most news publications. To read it is a strain for people who have poor vision.

This is the size print used in the Large Type Weekly. See how much easier it is to read.

Covers news and features from the regular New York Times

The Large Type Weekly contains a review of the week's major news events from the Sunday Times. Analyses by respected New York Times columnists. News of business and finance...the arts and entertainment...sports...family/style features. There's even a full-page crossword puzzle and a listing of TV highlights.

A thoughtful gift

When you help those with limited vision to experience again the satisfaction of reading about the world around them, you perform an act of kindness that can't be measured in ordinary terms.

And now you can give a trial subscription to someone at a 20 percent saving. Instead of $11 for the first three months, you pay only $8.80. (After that each three-month period costs $11.)

Just fill out and mail the coupon below. Or call this toll-free number to order: 800-325-6400. Do it today. The sooner you make it possible for someone you care about to actually read about the news (instead of just watching it on TV) the better. This special offer is for new subscribers only.

Collecting Rock Oldies—Records That Go Jingle

Records courtesy of Ralph M. Newman

"Forty-fives like the first disks by Elvis Presley, Simon and Garfunkel et al. now fetch prices in the four-figure range."

By STEVE DITLEA

The popular 45-rpm recording could well become the most collectible artifact of post-World War II America. Introduced by RCA Victor in March 1949 to rival the Columbia Records long-playing 33⅓-rpm disk, within a decade the doughnut-hole 45 became the standard format for all single commercial recordings issued in the U. S. As such, it can lay claim to being the most tangible and easily-stored memento of the popular culture of recent times.

Yet to be recognized by the auctioneers at Parke-Bernet and Sotheby's, 45 record collecting has already generated price increases which put the market in art and antiques to shame. Saucer-sized wafers of vinyl which not too long ago sold for under a dollar now fetch prices in the four figure range. Such high numbers shouldn't scare away potential collectors; most of the collectible 45's still sell in the $2 to $10 range and junk shops and rummage sales on occasion yield valuable records at a fraction of their original cost.

The first RCA Victor 45 release included such titles as "Ah Sweet Mystery of Life" by Nelson Eddy and Jeanette McDonald, "Carmen Fantaisie" by Jascha Heifetz, and "Because" by Perry Como, but given today's tastes, none of these holds much interest for the 45 collector. The most prized singles on the collectors' market bear the names of relatively obscure artists like The Five Sharps, The Vocaleers, and The Hide-A-Ways, or trend-setters like Elvis Presley and the Beatles; the music is almost invariably rock and roll and its antecedents (blues, rhythm and blues, rockabilly) —the music of those generations which have come of age to the sound of the seven-inch single.

Steve Ditlea frequently writes on pop music.

"Forty-fives bring you back to when you were inncent and young," says "Bleecker Bob" Plotnik, a practicing attorney who, for the last 14 years, has also been one of the more prominent "oldies" dealers in Greenwich Village. His private collection numbers over 15,000 singles. Like many 45 record hobbyists, he admits to his avocation being something of a compulsion ("deranged" is a word often used by avid collectors to describe one another). In addition to disks, he collects vintage comic books, baseball cards, and circa-1930 plastic table model radios.

Neither nostalgia nor fanaticism are prerequisites for admission to the ranks of collectors. "You have to like the music," insists Mr. Plotnik. "Collecting starts with your ears." To prove the point, in front of his new shop, Bleecker Bob's Golden Oldies (179 MacDougald Street), he introduces a passerby—15-year-old Lisa Carroll, who only collects material by Sparks, a post-1970 British rock band with a cult following. She has spent two years and "about $100" collecting 10 of the group's dozen out-of-print singles. Why just Sparks? "Because there's nothing like them," she offers. "They're the first rock band I've ever enjoyed."

Like the records it enshrines, 45 collecting is a great phenomenon rich in personal history. Until 1959 it was strictly an underground pursuit; no one would have conceived of selling a 45 over a dollar. Old singles (the ones which hadn't been melted down and recycled or simply been thrown out in the garbage) turned up in second-hand stores for a nickel apiece. Then a Times Square porn shop operator named Irving Rose noticed he was selling more dusty 45's than dirty pictures. "Times Square Slim," as he was to be known, opened the first oldies collectors' shop in the subway arcade below Broadway and 42nd Street.

Times Square Records quickly became a mecca for fanciers of 1950's rhythm and blues — especially "doo-wops," singles of the 4- and 5-part vocal harmony groups which blossomed on street corners and were recorded by small local labels destined for extinction. Originally pressed in quantities of a few thousand or less, these records acquired tremendous scarcity value. Many of the rarer titles were reproduced in limited editions, but for the serious collector only a first edition would do.

The most prized single on today's collectors' market owes its desirability to the legend of Times Square Slim (he closed his store in the mid-1960's). In his heyday Slim sponsored an oldies radio show to which collectors would bring their treasures for air play. Enter the proud possessor of a disk called "Stormy Weather" by The Five Sharps on the Jubilee label, only to have Slim's pet raccoon "Teddy" sit on the record and break it. That night Slim offered his radio audience the then unheard of sum of $10 for a replacement copy. Week after week he upped the price until it reached $500 in cash. By this time the shattered record's label alone sold for $20.

A few years ago when a 78-rpm edition of "Stormy Weather" finally turned up (during the 1950's both 78's and 45's of the same title were often pressed), it was valued at $1,500—despite an audible scratch running its entire length. According to Ralph Newman, owner of this one-of-a-kind disk, should a 45 ever be found (nobody is sure any exist), it would be worth $2,500. Such a major investment should by all rights assure one of a classic performance, but says Mr. Newman, editor of 45 collectors' publication "Rock and Roll Music Magazine," based on this record, the Five Sharps certainly did not rate at the top."

Thus rarity has as much to do with setting the value of oldies as musical quality — pehaps more. How else do you explain the commerce in original picture sleeves which are often worth more than the 45 they once held? According to the Adam Smith economics of the 45 collectors market, changing tastes make for volatile price levels. Interest in doo-wops peaked several years ago at the time of the Rock 'n' Roll Revival concerts; today all but the rarest of the rare can be had for under $20. Meanwhile a younger generation of collectors has created a rising demand for singles by the Beatles ("My Bonnie" by the Beat Brothers —The Beatles pre-Ringo — goes for around $500) and other British rockers; Elvis Presley (his first record, "That's All Right," on the Memphis-based Sun label fetches $300) and his rockabilly ilk; The Beach Boys ("Surfin" on X Records is said to be worth $70) and California surf music; The Monkees (due to reruns of their television series) and last, but far from least, the punk rock bands celebrating suburban teen defiance from 1965 to the present.

Lenny Kaye helped spark the collectibility of punk rock 45's with his compilation album, "Nuggets" (recently reissued by Sire Records). The former rock critic, whose collection of 1,500 singles of all genres is housed in two rooms of an aging West Side hotel, gained his expertise in obscure garage bands during a five year stint behind the counter of an oldies shop. These days his guitar playing is featured on the hottest item on the 45 collectors' market, a promotional single of Patti Smith singing "Hey Joe" on her own MER label. Most of 2,000 copies were given away; just 18 months later, offers for this disk range up to $75. With so much of his time now devoted to backing up Miss Smith, Lenny Kaye finds himself col-here are more good women artists around right now than you could shake a stick at. Some of them are famous, some of them aren't. Sometimes their work reproduces beautifully, sometimes it is virtually indecipherable unless you get to see it at first hand. the artists in question are politicized, some of them ut the point is that they set up the kind of benign across the whole panorama of imaginative effort as exerted by women novelists in the 1920's and hen Djuna Barnes and Virginia Woolf and Eliza- en were in their heyday.

Women Artists With Growing Authority

The Accomplishments Of Thomas Hoving

though he did much—more, perhaps, than anyone else, and certainly more visibly—to abet and enlarge and exacerbate this phenomenon, did not himself create it. (It might be more accurate to say that it was this phenomenon that created him, rather than he it.) The 1960's and early 1970's have constituted a period of unprecedented museum expansion everywhere—an expansion not only of physical facilities, financial expenditures, public services and exhibition schedules, but (what is probably even more significant) an expansion of the place occupied by the art museum in our culture as a whole. One does not have to be very old to remember a time when the art museum existed, even for people who regarded themselves as well educated, intellectually curious and even chic, on the margin of their cultural interests. This is distinctly not the case today. The art museum is now triumphantly "in." It has moved to a position of centrality in our culture, and it shows every sign of remaining there.

To occupy such a position entails awesome responsibilities, of course, and the wonder is not that the museums make so many mistakes in meeting them, but that they make so few. There are very few precedents, after all, for the kind as well as the volume of activity that museums now undertake to offer to the public, and there are few standards that can be applied with complete confidence. Especially in a culture like ours, in which attention tends to flag in the absence of ballyhoo and showmanship, the temptation is to turn everything—no matter how serious or esoteric or resistant to easy understanding—into a branch of show business. Yet one of the reasons why more and more people go to art museums, I believe, is that what they find in them seems so much more genuine and, yes, so much more beautiful—so much more the product of great gifts and great mind—than what they find in the ballyhoo culture on the outside.

The paradox of the art museum today is that it has felt itself obliged to adopt some of the methods—which inevitably means, some of the values—of this ballyhoo culture in order to preserve and propagate what in reality exists at a very great spiritual distance from it. It is a paradox that has both its tragic and its comic aspects, and it is worth remembering, I think, that we see in all this the essential paradox of democratic culture, with its struggle to sustain excellence and accessibility on more or less equal terms.

This, in any case, is the paradox that has presided over Mr. Hoving's robustious tenure as the director and guiding spirit of our greatest museum. He has added a great deal to the art life of the city and the country, but he has also taken something away. He has mounted splendid exhibitions, acquired a great many marvelous objects, and enlarged the museum to a size that can only be described as imperial. But he has also helped to create a large blur—a huge question mark on the mind—where there formerly existed a clearly perceived distinction: in the area where the experience of high art is distinguished from vulgar imitations and commercial substitutes. In everything from the creation of over-glamorized installations to the actual manufacture of reproductions, the Metropolitan in the Hoving era has led the way in erasing a precious distinction—the distinction, after all, that is the museum's very reason for being—between the authentic and the inauthentic in art. This is what Mr. Hoving has taken away: our confidence that the museum can be completely trusted to defend the interests of high art. Long after "Harlem On My Mind" and the other scandals of his administration have been forgotten, this is the issue that will continue to haunt us.

> 'For better or worse, Hoving has succeeded in making the museum—at least for some of the people, some of the time—a branch of mass culture.'

About Mr. Hoving's abilities as a museum showman, no one can any longer entertain any serious doubts. He has proved to be a consummate master of the revels. The crowds turn up again and again in record numbers, and he seems to have an unfailing sense of what will, as the sayings now goes, turn them on. For better or worse, he has succeeded in making the museum—at least for some of the people, some of the time—a branch of mass culture.

About his sense of excellence, it is more difficult to arrive at a consistent judgment. He has often woefully overpaid for his purchases of works of art, but these have generally been works of outstanding quality. Most museum directors are afflicted with a greedy appetite to acquire everything in sight —it is, you might say, one of the requirements of the job—and Mr. Hoving's appetite has been larger than most. But there is no question that it has sometimes led him astray.

The more one looks at the Lehman Pavilion, for example, the more dubious the whole enterprise becomes. The structure itself is an architectural absurdity, and the rooms it encloses—pretentious "period" rooms that lack a period—already look tacky, dated and faintly ridiculous. There are some great pictures in the Lehman collection, but there are others less worth hanging on the walls of the museum than some of the things Mr. Hoving handed over to the dealers in his de-accessioning misadventures. The whole affair looks more and more like a colossal and costly mistake, and will one day have to be undone—at God knows what trouble—by one of Mr. Hoving's successors.

On the other hand, where Mr. Hoving has turned his attention to reorganizing the display of what the Met already owned—in the magnificent Islamic galleries and in the newly opened Egyptian galleries, for example—he has brought real splendor and intelligence to the museum. For this reason, one has a certain confidence that the American Wing, when it opens, is likely to uphold this high standard. By and large—the Lehman Pavilion being the outstanding exception—Mr. Hoving has done a better job at reinstalling the museum's permanent collections than at installing its temporary exhibitions. It is as if two quite separate standards of taste have been applied, with the show business treatment generally reserved for the temporary exhibitions—another example, no doubt, of Mr. Hoving's sense of what it takes to have a box office success.

Mr. Hoving's tenure as director will be remembered, too, for his ventures into two other areas—the exhibitions the Met has organized with foreign governments (France and the Soviet Union especially), and its effort to establish a serious division of 20th-century art. The foreign loan exhibitions have certainly brought us some great things—the medieval tapestries from France and the Scythian gold objects from the Soviet Union—and the forthcoming exhibition of the "Treasures of Tutankhaman" promises to be another spectacular event of this sort. If the political implications

PHOTOGRAPHY VIEW

Formalists Who Flirt With Banality

By GENE THORNTON

At first glance, the color photographs of Stephen Shore currently on view at The Museum of Modern Art strongly resemble picture postcard views of unusually drab and boring Middle Western towns. Even when he photographs a picturesque city like Charleston, S.C., Shore ignores the beautiful old churches, houses and gardens that have been the principal subject matter of all previous photographers of Charleston in favor of corner filling stations and the backsides of nondescript commercial buildings. Usually, however, he avoids even the proximity of the picturesque and concentrates his attention on the kind of dismal small town where the principal sights are the drive-in movie theater, the new suburban residential section, the litter of motels, trailer camps and truck stops on the outskirts and the three-or-four-story downtown commercial district.

Shore does not, I hasten to add, look down on this subject matter. His photographs are as bland and uncritical as the most ardent Chamber of Commerce booster could desire. They do not praise, perhaps, but neither do they blame. In them a rose bush, a grassy back yard, a telephone pole, a view of distant mountains, a wire fence, a piece of crumpled shower curtain, a sack of onions, a tree, a street sign and the shiny red fender of a car all have equal value.

Even when Shore includes an immobilized mobile home in the same picture with the ruins of an old Southern mansion, he does not seem to be making the kind of outraged statement about the decay of a culture and its values that so many photographers have made with this kind of contrast. His color is equally bland and unemphatic. Unlike the expressive and distorted color of so many magazine photographs, it is, one suspects, as close as possible to the real color of the objects photographed.

This blandness and lack of comment makes Stephen Shore's photographs hard to take for a certain kind of viewer, among whom the present writer often finds himself. Why, one asks, should one bother to give serious attention to postcard views of backyards and boring towns? The answer seems to be that one is not supposed to look at the subject matter but at the form. In the past when photographers wanted to be formalistic—i.e., to emphasize arrangements of shape and color at the expense of subject matter—they imitated the effects of modernist painters and sculptors. Now, however, the new photographic formalists imitate the purely photographic effects of the snapshot, the picture postcard and the old-fashioned 8x10 stand camera.

> 'The photographs are as uncritical as the most ardent Chamber of Commerce booster could possibly desire.'

By deliberately choosing banal subject matter of no intrinsic interest, which they often frame in such a way as to further reduce any possible interest in the content, they focus the viewer's attention on the formal elements of the picture. Thus in Shore's townscapes one can often admire the beautifully managed intervals between telephone poles, sign standards and the edges of buildings and trucks. Even when this is not possible one can admire the essentially photographic color that owes nothing to the expressive distortions of painting. If all else fails, one can fall back on the fact that whatever else Shore is doing, he is not imitating painting.

Emmet Gowin is another young photographic formalist who has gradually been moving from a snapshot approach to the 8x10 stand camera approach. The current exhibition at Light Gallery and the new book, "Emmet Gowin Photographs" (Knopf, $8.95 paperback) demonstrate this movement. Gowin's earlier photographs strongly resemble the kind of small town family snapshots in which the wife, the kids, the old folks and the neighbors pose, mug and show off for the camera. They are, however, not at all in the sentimental, would-be ingratiating spirit of the usual family snapshot. For one thing, wife Edith is constantly taking off her clothes indoors, outdoors and in front of Granny and the children. This does not happen in the usual family snapshot. For another, Edith and her sister often glare into the camera with the sullen, alienated expressions that were once the prerogative of existential youth in Paris cafes, though now they appear even on billboard and subway advertisements for cigarettes.

In Paris cafes and on advertising billboards these expressions are meant to be taken as signs of sincerity, honesty, authenticity, etc., but in Gowin's photographs they seem, like Edith's nakedness, to be nothing more than a game played with the conventions of the family snapshot. Gowin pushes this game very far in one notorious picture of Edith in the barn lifting her dress and wetting the floor, but we are not really supposed to think she is some degenerate farm girl from Erskine Caldwell or William Faulkner-land. We are merely supposed to be shocked by this unwifely behavior into a realization that these are not really family snapshots but photographs about the family snapshot.

Or so it seems to me. In fairness to Emmet Gowin I have to say that he seems to regard his snapshot-like photographs as celebrations of a happy family life. Gowin's later photographs show a broadening of his subject matter to include landscape and still life, and in one landscape done in Yugoslavia in 1975 he achieves a classic beauty that has nothing to do with the snapshot. But throughout his entire work he seems to be concentrating on photographic form.

Neal Slavin's photographs at Light Gallery and in his new book, "When Two or More Are Gathered Together" (Farrar, Straus and Giroux, $25) also start from a conventional photographic form, the group portrait, and the bland neutrality of his treatment of bizarre and off-putting groups like the Star Trek Convention and the Girl Wrestling Enterprises links him to other young photographic formalists. Unlike most formalists, however, Slavin works hard to vary his poses and settings and bring out the peculiar characteristics of his subjects. For a formalist he comes dangerously close to achieving something as banal as old-fashioned human interest. ■

In Praise of Andrew Wyeth

To the Editor:

I am both amused and annoyed by the stereotyped "in" criticisms of Andrew Wyeth's paintings, quoted by Grace Glueck in The Times of Oct. 3 ("'Bless-Every-Blade-of-Grass Realism' at the Met"). Both Hilton Kramer and Katharine Kuh make the same mistake they would be the first to deride if coming from the average unenlightened viewer: judging a painting by its subject-matter rather than by its quality as painting. The same quotes—"rehearsal of painstaking nostalgia," "pseudo-aristocratic taste for ostentatiously humble subjects"—apply equally to Chardin; "sentimental and episodic" and "vacuous message" to Rembrandt.

An honest love for the land and for the look of old boards Wyeth has, but his treatment—the austere choice of colors, the precisely balanced structure—is anything but sentimental. Unenlightened viewers can wax sentimental over Chardin's burnished bowls or Rembrandt's biblical paintings just as they can over Wyeth's moving portraits of blacks: they all still remain great art.

LOUISE M. FORSCHER
Bedford, N.Y.

To the Editor:

Grace Glueck neglected to mention the comments of John Canaday, former art critic for The Times, in explanation of the vast New York critical antipathy to the master realist, Andrew Wyeth. He rightly observed that the N.Y. art establishment had not discovered and nurtured Wyeth. The painter dared to appeal to the public over their collective heads. Canaday also gave Wyeth high marks as a draftsman—or is that no longer considered important in the pandering to isms?

Wyeth's "vacuous message" deals with such simple human emotions as love, fear, hate, despair and with an acute awareness of death. His rural themes sometimes call for sentiment but he is rarely sentimental.

Critic Glueck and cohorts have been urbanized and cult-anesthetized for too long. The fresh air of Chadds Ford and Maine would do them a lot of good.

TED LOVINGTON, Jr.
Staten Island, N.Y.

To the Editor:

For many of us "average Americans," Andrew Wyeth represents a return to sanity in the art world. We recognize and relate to Wyeth's subject; we admire the precision of his technique; we can even grasp his affinity to the supernatural. And we can talk about him in terms everybody understands.

By whose standards are Pollock and de Kooning the best talent America has to offer? Thousands of educated Americans are willing to admit that they do not admire or enjoy most art classified as "abstract expressionism." For so many years we have been subjected to the frantic outburs of some of these shows have been troubling, the shows themselves have been excellent.

The Met's attempt to move into the area of 20th-century art, however, remains something of an enigma. In this field, there now seems to be no relation between the temporary exhibitions at the museum and the labor of building a permanent collection of some distinction. The current Andrew Wyeth show, organized by Mr. Hoving himself, only adds to the mystery of what he has hoped to accomplish in the realm of modern art. But there is one aspect of the Wyeth show about which there can be no lecting less, yet still he searches for a copy of the first instrumental he ever learned to play, "Far From You" by a mediocre New Jersey band, The Driftwoods, on the DBS label.

Many of today's rock stars are also dedicated collectors. The Rolling Stones, it's said, started their careers by playing along to the sound of their favorite singles. Frank Zappa has been saving 45's since 1955. Members of Led Zeppelin are known to collect blues and rockabilly. And then there's rock's No. 1 fan, Elton John, who once had to move to a bigger house to accommodate a record collection grown out of control. At present his home in England contains 25,000 singles while his Bel-Air, California, retreat holds another 2,000. One reason given for his recent halt to touring is Elton John's desire to catch up with all the disks he's amassed but hasn't had the chance to hear.

For the casual hobbyist, 45 collecting is often the result of uncovering a cache of records in a closet or basement. If properly stored in their paper sleeves and away from heat, singles are virtually immune to the effects of age. Any surface grime can be removed with alcohol and cotton. Wear from playing and mishandling is common; collectors make use of a five-step grading system (from "Mint" to "Poor") to rate the sound quality of a 45. A disk rated "Good"—one on which surface noise and scratches are audible throughout—is worth only about half as much as a "Mint" copy of the same title.

Until recently it was necessary to keep abreast of the collectors' market to learn the value of a single. Today's neophyte has the benefit of the first widely available catalogue of 45 rpm collectibles, the "Record Collector's Price Guide" by Jerry Osbone (O'Sullivan, Woodside, Phoenix, $6.95). Though the prices listed tend to be on the low side and this oversized paperback only covers the years 1950 to 1965, the "Price Guide" is still an invaluable reference work. Also helpful to the beginner are the artists' discographies contained in Steve Propes's "Those Oldies But Goodies—A Guide To 50's Record Collecting" (Collier, New York, $1.95) and "Golden Oldies —A Guide to 60's Record Collecting" (Chilton, Radner, Pa. $2.95).

Radio is the natural medium for getting acquainted with the sound of vintage 45's. Six years ago disk jockey Gus Gossert's oldies programs garnered the highest audience ratings in the history of FM radio and launched the latest wave of interest in collecting. He did his last show in New York in 1972. On Aug. 10 of this year, the self-styled "Curly-Headed Kid In The Second Row" was found dead in his car in Knoxville, Tennessee, with two bullets in his dead. Gus Gossert's rightful place in the annals of 45 collecting has since become a hot topic of debate. Among his successors in programming for collectors' tastes are "The Doo-Wop Shop" with Don K. Reed (Sundays 7:00-12:00 P.M., WCBS-FM), "The Night Train Show" (Sundays 6:00-10:00 P.M., WNBC), and "The Time Capsule Show" (Saturdays 4:00-6:00 P.M., WFUV).

"Some 45's have a high scarcity value."

Oldies fans support a half-dozen magazines dedicated to different eras of rock and roll history. Some of the fanzines are still largely devoted to the music of the 1950's, like "Record Exchanger" P.O. Box 2144, Anaheim, Ca. 92804, $6.00 a year) and "Time Barrie Express" (P.O. Box 1109, White Plains, N. Y. 10602, $5.00 a year) while rock of the 1960's and 1970's is covered in "Who Put The Bomp" (P.O. Box 7112, Burbank, Ca. 91510, $4.00 a year). British rock comes under the purview of "Trouser Press" (P.O. Box 2434, New York, N.Y. 10017, $6.00 a year). In addition to performers' biographies and discographies, the fanzines feature collectors' ads and lists of their own oldies for sale to the highest bidder. The most extensive mail-order auctions are those conducted by "Record Exchanger" and "Songs and Records" (P.O. B Ca. 91510. $6.00 a y

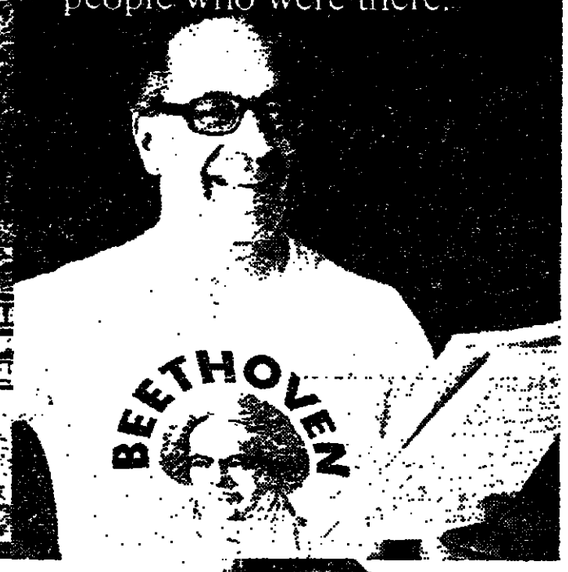
There's a lot more to a great music station than great music.

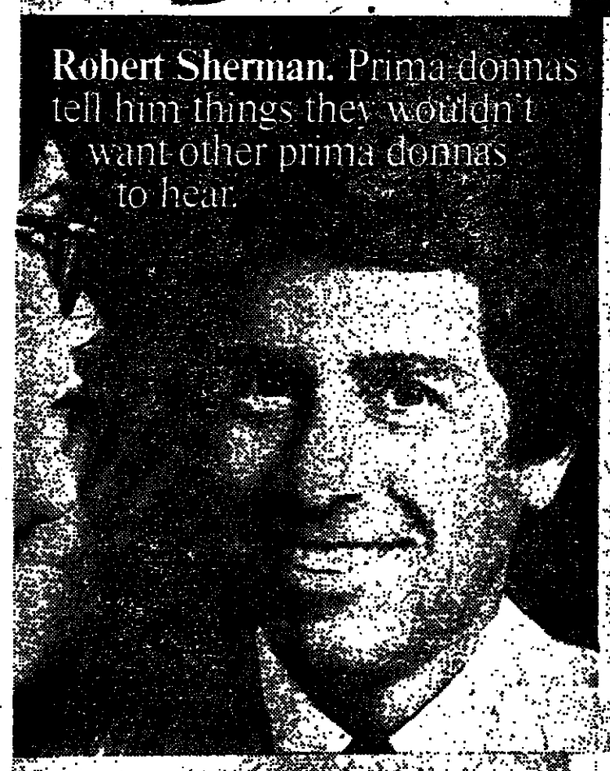
George Edwards Chopin and galoshes.

News, Views and Reviews Around the Clock. With Bill Blair, Casper Citron, Clive Barnes and June LeBell.

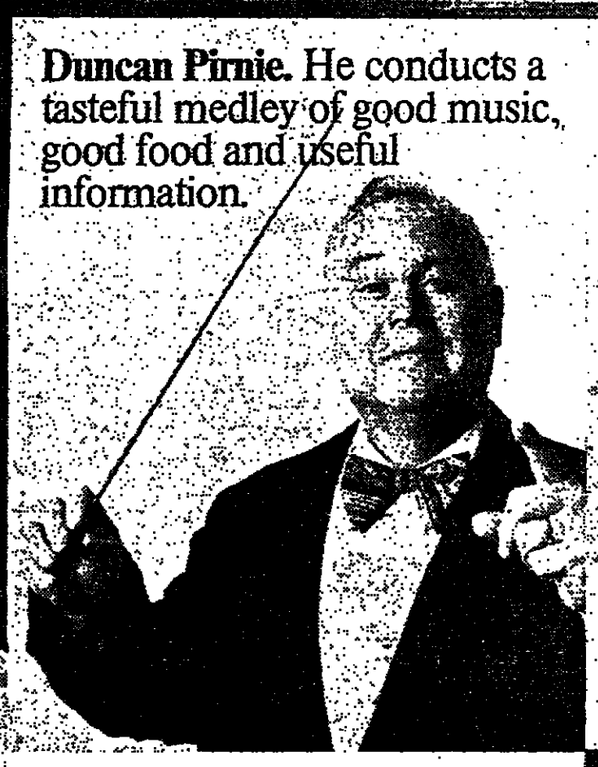
Karl Haas. He knows more about the first performance of Beethoven's 9th than the people who were there.



Robert Sherman. Prima donnas tell him things they wouldn't want other prima donnas to hear.



Duncan Pirnie. He conducts a tasteful medley of good music, good food and useful information.



George Jellinek. He knows a voice when he hears one.

Free Home Delivery of the New York Philharmonic, and the Boston, Cleveland, Philadelphia and Israel too.

A great music station should bring you great music.

That's its primary job.

And WQXR does that job.

But we think a great music station should be a great station, too. Which means it should be a vivid tapestry of music, insight into music, and fascinating personalities.

It should please, delight, inform and enrich its listeners.

That's what we aim for. And succeed at. We're unique.

Because there may be other stations in New York that play great music. But there's only one great music station that's a great station, too.

Arts and Leisure Guide

Edited by ANN BARRY

Of Special Interest

Europe in 1776

The Grolier Club has mounted an exhibition under this title which, in a Bicentennial turnabout, focuses exclusively on the European scene through printed material during the period of 1770 through 1779. Included are first editions of outstanding works published in 1776 by Adam Smith, Gibbon, Mirabeau and Klinger; and documents related to the World of Thought, Voyages and Travels, the World of Letters, Theater and Music, Politics and Economics, Medicine and Science. (See Art)

Met First

Massenet's opera "Esclarmonde" was such a smash hit in 1889 that, for a half year, it was performed on an average of four times a week at the Théâtre Français. Thereafter, however, it dipped in popularity and was given only sporadically. In the United States, it surfaced in New Orleans in 1893 and was not revived until 1974 in San Francisco. On Friday, the opera—a Byzantine drama about an emperor of magical powers who bequeaths his kingdom to his sorcerer daughter—will have its premiere at the Met. Joan Sutherland will sing the title role; Clifford Grant, the Australian bass, will make his debut as Emperor Phorcas; and Lofti Mansouri will direct in his Met debut. (See Music)

Town Hall Gala

Town Hall, which started out as a lecture hall in 1921 but evolved into a concert hall because, by happenstance, it had first-rate acoustics, is holding a gala benefit this evening to keep itself in business. Its business being, in addition to its regular evening programs, early-evening recitals called "Interludes," alfresco jazz concerts produced at Rockefeller Center, Grace Plaza and Bryant Park, and travel film series. On hand will be performers who made their debuts at Town Hall way back when—Marian Anderson, Jorge Bolet, Jan Peerce—and other artists too numerous to mention. (See Music)

Photo Query

"Masters of the Camera: Stieglitz, Steichen and Their Successors," the show opening today at the International Center of Photography, is an attempt to answer the question posed by critic Gene Thornton, who developed the show's theme: Must the maker of a photographic masterpiece have worked primarily to gratify his own creative urge, or can a masterpiece result when a photographer is meeting the requirements of a magazine or newspaper editor, an advertiser, a government or social agency, or a private portrait client? At ICP one sees in the first category Alfred Stieglitz, Paul Strand, Edward Weston and Ansel Adams, and in the second Edward Steichen, Dorothea Lange, Walker Evans, Weegee and Ernst Haas. (See Photography)

Tharp on Ice

Twyla Tharp, the bouncy, pixie choreographer of whimsical, somewhat frenetic pieces, has turned her talent to ice "dancing." For the ice-skating spectacle called Superskates III, which takes place Monday at Madison Square Garden, Miss Tharp has choreographed a number for John Curry, the World Men's Champion Figure Skater, to the tune of Albioni's "Concerto for Trumpet in B Flat." Other performers skating to their own designs include Ken Shelley, JoJo Starbuck and Linda Fratianne. Proceeds go to the United States Olympic Committee. (See Miscellany)

Unless otherwise noted, the critical judgments in this Guide reflect the published views of Times critics

Theater

Molly, who considered it a modern fairytale about a gentleman bandit. Book and lyrics by Alfred Uhry; music composed by Robert Waldman. Directed by Gerald Freedman; starring Barry Bostwick. "An illusionless mixture of square-dance and folk play . . . given like an immensely invigorating charade in some Mississippi barnyard." (Barnes) Biltmore, 261 W. 47th St. (JU 2-5340)

SAME TIME, NEXT YEAR — Bernard Slade's Broadway debut play about a man (Ted Bessell) and a woman (Sandy Dennis) in a once-a-year nonmonogamous adultery lasting from 1951 to 1975. Directed by Gene Saks. "A neatly functional sentimental comedy thoroughly conscientious about getting a laugh every 40 to 60 seconds." (Kerr) Brooks Atkinson, 256 W. 47th St. (CI 5-3430)

SHENANDOAH—William Shapman is a musical set within the turmoil of the American Civil War. Directed by Philip Rose, music and lyrics by Gary Geld and Peter Udell. "What the authors-composers have done is "to seize upon the most commonplace of Saturday Evening Post covers, strip it of both prettification and the mockery we've progressively applied to it, and offer it as the original bare bones of legend." (Kerr) Alvin, 250 W. 52d St. (PL 7-8646)

STREAMERS—The conclusion of David Rabe's Vietnam trilogy, which is set in a barrack room and takes the interlocking themes of two minorities—homosexuals and blacks—to indicate the sudden awful pressures that can detonate a disaster. THE THREEPENNY OPERA—The Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill modern classic in a new translation by Ralph Manheim and John Willett. Directed by Richard Foreman; with Philip Bosco, C. K. Alexander, Elizabeth Wilson, Roy Brocksmith, Ellen Greene. Presented by Joseph Papp's New York Shakespeare Festival. Clive Barnes: "The most interesting and original thing Mr. Papp has produced since he set up shop at the Vivian Beaumont three seasons ago." Walter Kerr: "It'll leave you slack—except for the satisfaction your ears may take in Mr. Foreman's firm grotesqueries and the certainty that any moment now Mr. Weill will be heard from again." Beaumont, 150 W. 65th St. (787-8000)

THE WIZ—An all-black musical version of "The Wizard of Oz," directed by Geoffrey Holder. "Everything is done confidently . . . It just doesn't have firm ground beneath it, to say where it's come from: Kansas, Harlem, M-G-M, or a kiddies' matinee." (Kerr) Majestic, 247 W. 44th St. (CI 6-0730)

Time to Tuck in the Tenderest Plants Before Winter Arrives

...rtant is the proper protec...gile shrubs, particularly specimen evergreens and unusual species against breakage from snow and ice. The best method is to erect wooden frames of laths over the plants. Once made, they can be stored, after dismantling in the early spring, and reused over and over again. Painted green, they are more attractive.

These structural coverings are often necessary over evergreen and deciduous shrubs along house foundations, where snow accumulations slide off roofs and break plants. Formal evergreen hedges along sidewalks and driveways are vulnerable where snow is shoveled or dumped by snow blowers. In these instances, side protection with boards, wires, or sheets of burlap can be added. In addition, these barriers will keep off sun and excessive wind that cause foliage burn.

Polyethylene plastic supported by strong stakes can be stretched along the sides of hedges. As long as air can circulate easily around the hedge there will be no problem. However, never wrap plastic around individual plants or groupings. Plastic will cause heat build up inside, increase transpiration and result in plant damage.

Specimen shrubs and herbs that benefit from winter protection include boxwood, caryopteris, somewhat tender azaleas and rhododendrons, English holly and santolina, and rosemary, where root hardy.

Though winter hardy, some evergreens—yew and juniper—are susceptible to snow damage and snap under its weight. These shrubs can be tied loosely with twine rope starting at the base and working upward spirally. A single or two or three stakes inserted around the plant will prevent it from bending over in heavy snowstorms.

Tender plants on the borderline of their hardiness zones can be wrapped loosely with layers of burlap or marsh

Major Show Opens At the Garden This Friday

The 28th annual National Postage Stamp Show, a high point of each fall's philatelic season, and one of the largest exhibits in the Western Hemisphere, takes place the end of this week, Friday through Sunday, Nov. 19-21, in the Exposition Rotunda of Madison Square Garden. The show, which is sponsored by the American Stamp Dealers Association, is the final event of National Stamp Collecting Week. A new 7.7-cent bulk rate postage stamp in coil form that is being issued by the United States on Nov. 20 in New York City will make its debut at the show.

As in past years, there will be a goodly array of postal administration and philatelic agencies participating, and there will be lectures on all facets of philately.

For Canadian ships

One of the features of the 1976 National Postage Stamp Show will be the first day of issue of four new stamps from Canada in the ship series devoted to Canadian inland vessels, and of three stamps from the United Nations —two commemoratives for the World Food Council and a 9-cent definitive stamp, described in last week's column in detail. The United States Postal Service, which has been absent from recent domestic stamp shows is returning. Also present will be the postal administrations of Great Britain, Sweden, Australia and India with a range of recent issues, the Isle of Man Post Office Authority with its just issued Yule stamps, Jersey's Philatelic Bureau with a display of U.S. Bicentennial items, the New Zealand postal administration with stamps just out this Wednesday, and the Crown Agents Stamp Bureau with new issues from the territories it represents.

There will be a set of four new stamps from South Africa featuring sports activities and the first issues from the new Republic of Transkei, created out of a part of South Africa as a black nation, whose stamps at this moment must be considered of undetermined validity because it is not as yet recognized by other nations.

In what will undoubtedly be one of the last of the Bicentennial commemorations, the ASDA will issue the last of its souvenir cards for the nation's 200th birthday, the tenth of the series. The card, about 6 by 8 inches, depicts the U.S. vertical commemorative of 1957, the 3-cent rose lake put out to mark the bicentenary of the birth of the Marquis de Lafayette, one of the Europeans who volunteered his services to aid the American cause in the Revolution. The card, along with the previously issued cards, is available for $1.

The hours for the show are 10 A.M. to 9 P.M. on Friday, 10 A.M. to 7 P.M. on Saturday and 11 A.M. to 6 P.M. on Sunday. Admission is $2 for adults and $1 for youngsters under the age of 12.

The new 7.7-cent U.S. stamp is a consequence of a reduction in bulk mail rates from 7.9 cents. It will be available to bulk mail users in precanceled form in coils of 500 and 3,000 stamps only. Collectors can purchase 30 stamps instead of the usual 25. Similar quantities may be ordered by mail from the Philatelic Sales Division, U.S. Postal Service, Washington, D.C. There is a postage and handling charge of 50 cents per order.

Collectors of first-day-of-issue cancellations must accompany their addressed envelopes with a remittance of 16 cents per cover; the USPS prefers remittance by check or money order rather than cash and does not accept stamps in payment. Orders for first-day covers should be sent to "7.7-cent Stamp, Postmaster, New York, N.Y. 10001." Because of the lateness of the announcement, the deadline for orders is Dec. 6.

"Why buy a camera in the Caribbean when I give you the best deal under the sun."
Mario Hirsch

This business about buying cameras in the duty free ports is a lot of baloney. Maybe you can save money on perfumes and booze, but nobody's gonna make a killing on a camera. Why for crying out loud, I can give you just as good a price right here in Hell's Kitchen as you can get on Paradise Island.
And I'll tell you something else, too. There's a lot more to buying a camera than just a good price. What about selection? At Hirsch Photo I'll stack my stock against anybody's. Just for openers, I've got the whole Minolta line—from eye cups to the XK—who else has that?
And what about service? Don't you want somebody to explain how the camera works? What good is buying a camera on your vacation and then botching up all the vacation pictures. And if you've got a complaint, what are you gonna do—travel 1,500 miles to see the guy who sold you the camera?
So if you're thinking of buying a camera on your vacation, do yourself a favor—and buy it before you go on vacation. And do yourself another favor, buy it at Hirsch Photo. Because with the deal I give, you can keep yourself in piña coladas for a whole week.

Caring For Movie Films

Every home moviemaker will agree that films taken over the years of children growing up, of memorable vacation trips, or of special family occasions, are priceless possessions—yet if care is not taken in the storing, handling and showing of these films footage taken of a child's first birthday may be all but unusable by the time the youngster's 10th birthday rolls around.

The steps required to prevent this kind of catastrophe from happening are not elaborate, but there are some definite precautions that should be observed when projecting or storing film in order to preserve them and keep them in condition for repeated showings which everyone can enjoy.

Heat, light, and humidity are the principal enemies of movie film. Excessive exposure to any of these elements can cause colors to fade, fungus spots to appear, or the film to become brittle and tear. This means some of the most common storage places for home movies are also the worst for preserving them: the top shelf of a closet, a cabinet near a radiator or hot air duct, an uninsulated attic, or a damp basement—all places that can ultimately hasten the film's deterioration. Ideally, film should be stored at a temperature of less than 75 degrees, and a relative humidity of about 50 percent.

For safe storage, film reels should be placed in clean film cans. In addition to providing protection from light and dust, these cans also prevent damage from the pressure of adjacent reels. The reels should be large enough to allow about ¼-inch of empty space at the end of the flanges.

Many reels are flimsy and cannot maintain uniform spacing between their flanges. This can be true of both the metal and plastic varieties. Good quality reels resist bending and are worth their extra cost because a reel that is bent usually cannot be straightened out satisfactorily, and it can cause the film to become nicked and scratched. It's better to throw away a reel than to have to throw away the film.

Correctly wound film is neither too tight nor too loose, and it looks smooth on both sides of the reel with no protruding edges. Although it may seem desirable to tighten a loosely wound reel by pulling on the end of the film, this is never a good idea. When a film reel is tightened in this manner after it has been wound, a series of scratches, called "cinch marks," will result throughout the entire reel of film.

Always attach several feet of blank leader to the beginning and the end of each reel of film because these are the most vulnerable spots. If damage does occur here, the leader can be replaced without losing important footage. Many moviemakers neglect putting a leader at the tail ends of their films, and since the processing laboratories do not do it, filmmakers may not realize that this tail leader offers worthwhile protection. For example, the last bit of film may stick and burn in the projector gate—and it's better to have this happen to an expendable leader than to the film itself.

Dirt specks present a constant danger to film. A tiny bit of dust on a film will look like a locust invasion when magnified on the screen. Aside from detracting from the aesthetic quality of the picture, these bits of dirt can also dig into the film, causing scratches that will show up as long vertical lines. Prevention demands frequent cleaning of the projector by using a can of compressed air, an ear syringe, or a soft brush to wisk dust out of the film gate and channel.

Periodically the film itself should also be cleaned. This can be done easily by utilizing the rewind arms of a viewer-editor and a clean, soft cloth (rayon or nylon velvet is excellent). Simply fold the cloth over the film and hold it in place as it is rewound onto the reel. An even better way is to wet-clean the film by moistening the cloth with a movie film cleaner containing lubricant. Wind the film slowly so that it will be dry before it is wound onto the takeup reel. Wet cleaning keeps the film moisturized and pliable and the colors bright. In addition the lubricant contained in the film cleaner facilitates the film's moving smoothly through the projector, thus preventing torn perforations and possible burns.

A certain amount of watchfulness is necessary during threading and projection of motion picture film. Automatic loading projectors are notorious film shredders, so alert projectionists should be ready with their fingers near the control switch in case the film jams or slips. In the case of a dual 8 projector, the machine must be set for the correct gauge or the perforation holes will be torn and new ones punched in.

It's a good idea to leave the room lights on until it is certain that the film loop is the correct size, that feed and take-up reels are rotating smoothly, and that the film is not piling up on the floor. Also, see that the reels are securely locked on their shafts; film will certainly be damaged if a reel falls off during the show. For all of these reasons the home moviemaker should follow the practice of professional projectionists and sit next to the projector—just in case.

Damage to film can also occur during the editing process if the filmmaker is not careful. Dirt, again, is a problem, so don't permit film to fall on the floor or drag along a dirty or dusty work surface. Unless he is wearing protective cotton editing gloves, the filmmaker should only hold the strand of film by its edges because fingerprints will leave a minute amount of acid that will etch itself permanently into the film. Another potential source of trouble is a poorly made splice, which can catch in the projector and cause a sprocket hole to tear.

Sometimes disaster strikes and even pampered film looks like it needs intensive care. Fortunately, there are companies that specialize in rejuvenating damaged Inc., 141 Moonachie Ro N.J. 07074, (201) 440-85 Film Technique, Inc., 37- Long Island City, N.Y. 11 4600; both will work wit sizes and the results ar miraculous. Gambits Have Short Lives

HAIFA, ISRAEL

While there are gambits, such as the Marshall Counterattack in the Ruy Lopez, that perennially defy all attempts at a solution, the life span of the average gambit is quite brief. On its first outing, any reasonable gambit has a great chance of capitalizing its shock value, but thereafter it must reveal solid justification or end up in the lists of the discarded and unsound.

The hard problem is to discriminate between the inspired and the merely ingeniously junky. In the case of the Schliemann gambit, the answer you get seems to depend on whom you ask.

Consider the gambit used by C. Micheli of Italy against William Lombardy of the United States in the fourth round of the Olympiad here in the Dan Carmel Hotel. It had been tried several times previously, although if Black cannot find a counter to Lombardy's smooth, threat-repulsing development, this gambit's brief turn on the stage is done.

The gambit move, 9 . . . N-K1, arose out of the realization that 9 . . . KN-Q2 yields Black a lifeless game after 10 PxQP, KPxP; 11 0-0. Yet after the acceptance of the gambit by 12 BxKP, Black gains but one tempo with 12 . . . N-Q2; 13 B-KB2.

Post Mortem Hindsight

After the game, Micheli argued that his 14 . . . R-N1 lacked punch and that he could have set Lombardy tougher problems by an immediate 14 . . . N-QB4. That remains to be seen, however, since White can play 15 B-B2, after which 15 . . . NxP? is smeared by the triple fork 16 Q-Q5.

In this line, Black may try 15 . . . B-K3, yet it is not clear what he would have on 16 N-Q5 or 16 R-N1 or even 16 P-QN3. After Micheli mistimed 14 . . . R-N1, Lombardy consolidated quickly and, at the stage of his 19 Q-K3, White remained a clear passed pawn ahead without anything that might be termed a weakness.

Micheli's 19 . . . B-B7, speculating on 20 R-Q2, N-B4 with excellent play, was shot down by Lombardy's 20 R-Q5, since 20 . . . Q-B2; P-KN4 trapped the black QB. Of course, Micheli could have given another pawn with 21 . . . P-N4; 22 QxNP, to free the piece, but then—

MICHELI/BLACK

Position After 19 . . . B-B7

two pawns down with a broken kingside—his days would have been numbered.

Nevertheless, his giving up a bishop with 21 . . . P-KR4; 22 R-B1, BxP; 23 PxB was equally desperate. After Lombardy's 25 P-B5, 26 Q-Q3 and 27 QxR, the black knight had to be sidelined. Lombardy's 28 B-N3 virtually forced the blocking of the black bishop diagonal by 28 . . . P-K4, since 28 . . . Q-B1; 29 P-B6 R-R6; 30 P-B7 is annihilating. Here 30 Q-QB5 also compels Black to fold his tents.

When Lombardy mobilized for a mating attack with 29 N-K4, 31 R-B3 and 32 R-B3, Micheli could well have called it quits. His blunder 33 . . . N-K2 forced him to resign because 34 QxPch, K-R2; 35 BxP leads to mate.

Door Closers Save Heat—and Prevent Slamming

BERNARD GLADSTONE

Although pneumatic and hydraulic door closers have long been popular for use on storm and screen doors to prevent annoying slamming and —and to eliminate the need for ly reminding youngsters to t door!"—energy-conscious ers often forget that they can tant money-savers as well.

king certain that exterior not left open a closer will t from being wasted during ter and kilowatts from being ring hot weather when air ing units are on. And, by nterior doors closed which sement steps, garages, attics potentially dangerous areas lso help to avoid the kind of that can occur with pets or dren when these doors are unintentionally.

r closers are powered by ings on the inside—that is, d spring of some kind pro- nergy required to close the it has been swung open. o keep the door from slam- with a bang, a cushion of (in the case of pneumatic d (in the case of hydraulic ed to slow up the closing ovide a relatively smooth closing and latching action. ioned above, pneumatic from hydraulic closers in mer contain a cushion of inside, while the latter are . All pneumatic units, and e hydraulic units sold for consist of long tubes that e cylinder of a bicycle ton inside this tube moves rth as the door is opened door is being opened the ned so the piston moves ffers little or no resistance . However, when the door and the spring starts to piston cannot move fast must now push its way through a trapped column of air or oil.

Photos by Leigh Products and Ideal Security

Small rotary hydraulic closers are suitable for medium-weight doors.

In the case of pneumatic units which use air, the air is being compressed and allowed to escape slowly through a small hole at the opposite end of the cylinder. The size of this hole regulates the speed with which air can escape, and hence the speed of closing.

In the case of hydraulic units, the piston moves through a cylinder full of oil which also slows it down. The speed is determined by the viscosity of the oil, as well as by tiny holes which allow the oil to seep past or through the piston.

In addition, to piston type units, hydraulic door closers also come in a rotary design which has an oil-filled drum, instead of a cylinder-and-piston arrangement. Similar to the heavy duty type normally seen on doors in office buildings and similar commercial establishments, these are generally stronger and more powerful units that can handle heavier residential doors.

Piston-type closers come in hydraulic (top) or pneumatic types.

As a rule, hydraulic door closers of equivalent quality cost more than pneumatic units, and most are capable of handling heavier doors and stronger winds (where doors are exposed to gusts that can blow them open). They also offer one big advantage over pneumatic door closers which depend on a cushion of air to slow them up. With an air unit a certain amount of closing distance or piston travel must take place before there is a cushion of air created to slow up the door's movement. This means that a small child who only opens the door a few inches could still get caught by a slamming door.

With a hydraulic unit that contains oil there is an immediate cushion that keeps the door under control the minute it starts to swing closed. This also means that the door will not "bounce" after it closes the first foot or so—a common occurence with pneumatic closers, especially if they are not adjusted properly.

Most of the larger producers make door closers in various sizes or capacities. As a rule, the package will describe the size or type door for which it is recommended, but if in doubt it is always better to get a larger or stronger one. This is especially true for outside doors that may be subject to sudden gusts of wind. Incidentally, with doors of this kind it is a good idea to also add a chain protector which will catch the door when the wind is too strong for the closer, and thus prevent damage to either the door or the closer.

The better quality closers almost always will include some type of adjustment to regulate the speed of closing. In the case of pneumatic units, the adjustment may consist of a screw that controls the size of the air escape opening; in the case of a hydraulic unit it may be a screw that controls an opening (on the inside) which permits oil to bypass the movable section. Some closers also permit the owner to adjust tension on the spring, which will also affect the speed of losing, and also permits increasing tension as the unit ages.

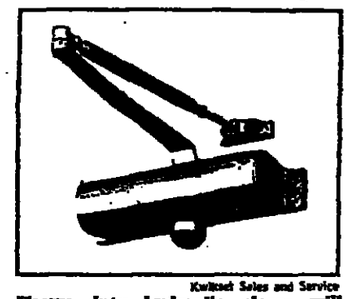
Generally speaking, light duty pneumatic closers are adequate for ordinary screen doors and lightweight aluminum storm-and-screen doors, while medium duty hydraulic closers are recommended for heavier storm doors and most normal front doors. However, if the door is larger and heavier than normal, then it is best to get a heavy duty model.



Kwikset Sales and Service

Heavy duty hydraulic closer will control larger, heavyweight doors.

In addition to selecting the size unit required when shopping for a door closer the specifications should be studied to make certain it will fit the purpose for which it is intended. For example, while most closers can be adapted for either right or left hand doors, some project out more than others and may not fit between a storm door and a regular outside door. Also, while some can be used on either in-swinging or out-swinging doors, others cannot, so make certain the one purchased is suitable for the use in mind.

Most hydraulic door closers require little or no maintenance, other than an occasional adjustment of closing speed or spring tension as the unit ages. However, the piston arm should be kept clean and a few drops of oil applied to pivot points and movable parts about once a year. Also, mounting screws should be checked periodically to make certain they are tight.

On pneumatic closers the piston should be wiped down with an oily rag at least twice a year, and pivot points should be lubricated as described above. Since this type does not have oil on the inside the leather washer on the piston may eventually dry out so that it no longer creates an air-tight seal. On some brands the end of the cylinder can be unscrewed so that the leather can be oiled and thus rejuvenated. On those where the cylinder is sealed it sometimes helps to drip oil down along the piston shaft (after taking the unit off and holding it vertical). But if this doesn't work the closer will have to be discarded and replaced with a new one. ■

Home Clinic

Q: My kitchen cabinets are birch and the finish is stained, marred, and irregularly worn. I don't want to refinish them, but wonder if you can tell me how to prepare them for painting, and what kind of paint to use?—Mrs. R.S.S., New York City

A. The first thing I would suggest is to scrub them thoroughly with strong detergent and water. After the wood is completely dry, sand with medium grit paper till the surface is smooth and there is no gloss left anywhere. Then apply one coat of enamel underbody, followed by two coats of either high gloss or semi-gloss enamel.

Q: Can you tell me the best way to repair nail "pops" in my plasterboard walls and ceilings? I want to repair them permanently before I repaint so they will not come back.—F.F., Vienna, Va.

A: First drive the old nails well below the surface, then drive new nails in about two inches away from the old ones, but into the same stud or beam. However, this time use annular-threaded or "ringed" nails, since these hold much better and will not pop. Then fill all the holes with joint cement or spackling compound and you are ready for painting or papering.

Q: I live on a noisy street and I wonder if there is some way I can soundproof the three windows in my bedroom so I will have less trouble falling asleep. I've been to several plastic firms and they tell me that plastic will not soundproof the windows. Can you give me any suggestions?—Mrs. P.D., Brooklyn, N.Y.

A: I agree that plastic won't help. If the windows do not have storm sash, then putting up storm windows on the outside will help some. Also, putting foam type weatherstripping around the edges of the sash will help a little. Probably the most effective means of deadening sound transmission through the windows would be heavy, lined hangings or draperies—the heavier the better. And if practical, two rows of hangings, separated by a couple of inches, would be even better than one.

Questions about home repair problems should be addressed to: Home Improvement Department, The New York Times, Times Square, New York, N.Y. 10036. Only those questions of general interest will be answered here.

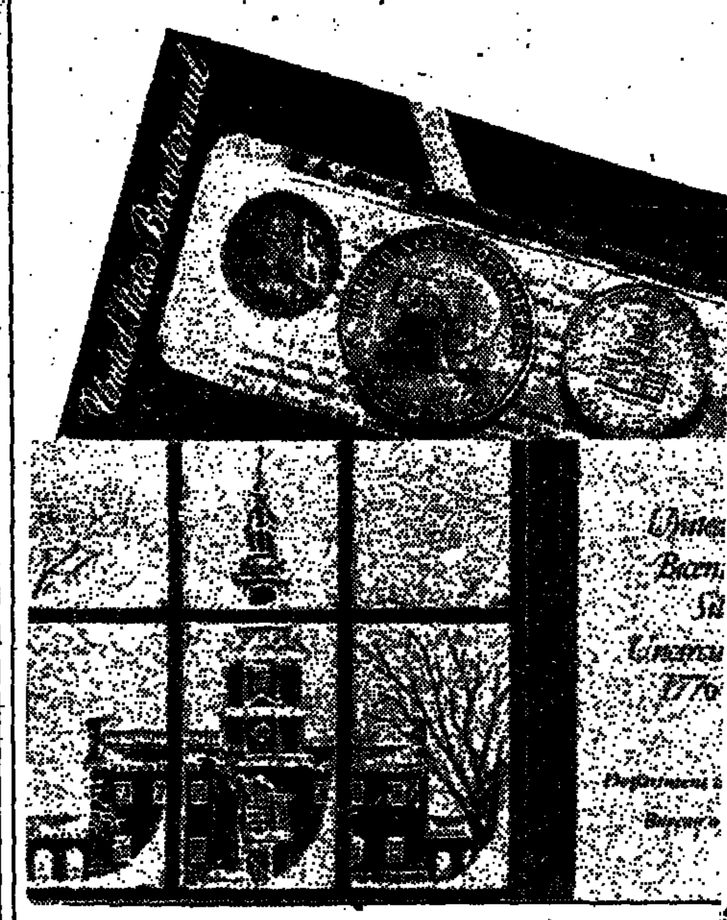
Mint Adds Gift Packa[ge]



Bicentennial coin set package shows independence H[all]

Sales of the three-coin, 40 percent silver Bicentennial uncirculated coin sets got a definite boost when the U.S. Mint inaugurated its bulk-rate sales program late last year. Now the Mint has given these sets another plus—a colorful holiday gift packaging—that should appeal not only to numismatic collectors but also to anyone looking for a distinctive Christmas gift with a direct link to the Bicentennial. As shown above, the package is dominated by an old-fashioned winter scene, a "through a snow-rimmed window" view of historic Independence Hall in Philadelphia. The principal colors used in the packaging are crimson and white.

The package design has an extra dimension in that the rendition of Independence Hall is quite similar to the special Bicentennial design on the reverse of the Kennedy half dollar. The other two coins in the set are the Washington quarter, with a colonial drummer boy on the reverse, and the Eisenhower dollar, with a reverse design combining the Liberty Bell and moon. All three carry the commemorative dual-dating of 1776/1976. The special Bicentennial designs, as previously reported, will be discontinued at the end of this year and the three coins will be produced in 1977 with their familiar eagle reverse designs

The three-piece uncirculated coin sets (also known as Mint sets) are carefully selected for maximum freedom from flaws and blemishes, but they are not specially struck as are the coins in proof sets. The uncirculated sets are priced at $9 each (proof sets are $12). Under the Mint's bulk-rate sales program, the uncirculated sets are priced at $7 when ordered in quantities of 50 or more. (Families, friends and neighbors can pool their small orders into one minimum 50-set order to take advantage of the bulk discount.)

from Rufus Choate, a U.S. Senator from Massachusetts, which said: "We join ourselves to no party that does not carry the flag and keep step to the music of the Union."

The new stamp, printed in brown ink on a canary paper, is in design harmony with the 7.9-cent stamp that preceded it, featuring material relating to the history and culture of the United States. Each stamp measures .76 by .86 inches.

Ships

The four Canadian stamps, horizontals printed se-tenant by a combination of one-color steel and nine-color lithography, depict three passenger steamers and a riverboat. Three of the vessels played significant roles in the internal conflicts of Canada's past, and one of the three played a part first in the struggle between the North and the South in the United States.

One of the stamps shows the "Chicora," originally named the "Let Her B" when the craft was constructed in England as a blockade runner for the Confederacy. The ship was speedy and profitable and, although blasted by Union gunboats, survived the war. Rechristened and made smaller, the vessel was used on the Great Lakes and helped carry troops during the Riel Rebellion in Canada in the closing decades of the 19th century.

Japan's continuing ship series has come up with eight more stamps depicting a whole array of vessels from past to present. The only coins ever minted to portray The Six Sovereign Queens Of England

In the thousand-year history of British Royalty, only six women have ruled England. Now, in the 25th year of Elizabeth II's reign, these women are together on remarkably designed gold and silver coins. You may acquire limited edition Proofs of these historic issues if your order is postmarked no later than November 30, 1976.

When England became a great maritime power and colonizer of the world . . . when Shakespeare produced his memorable literary works . . . when Great Britain became a "United Kingdom" . . . and when it could truly be said, "The Sun Never Sets On The British Empire", a Sovereign Queen was ruling England. Indeed, the reigns of the Six Sovereign Queens of England have totaled over 150 years and have spanned more than four centuries.

Official Minter — The Royal Canadian Mint

The 1976 Cayman Islands Six Queens Proof issues are exquisitely designed and perfectly minted by the famed Royal Canadian Mint. Each coin is accompanied by a Certificate of Authenticity attesting to its Proof status and precious metal content, signed by Vassel G. Johnson, Financial Secretary of the Cayman Islands. The Six Queens coins have full legal tender status in the Cayman Islands.

An absolutely beautiful gem, the $100 Proof coin is larger in size, and much higher in gold content than most other gold coins of comparable face value. The equally stunning $50 coin is one of the largest silver coins ever issued by a Caribbean nation, and the largest ever issued by the Cayman Islands.

Inset Designs Enhance Beauty of Cameo Portraits

Featuring frosted relief cameo portraits of Queens Mary I, Elizabeth I, Mary II, Anne I, and Victoria I, the reverse designs of the Six Queens coins are as unique as the women they portray. Highlighted against mirrorlike backgrounds, the finely sculpted portraits are inset in the surface of the coin.

ORDERING INFORMATION: Deadline — November 30, 1976

All Proof issues are strictly limited to two per person, and orders must be postmarked by the Official deadline date of November 30, 1976. Orders received with a postmark later than November 30 must be returned. Two-coin Proof Sets will be housed in deluxe black leather book-style cases, Proof $100 Gold Coins in brilliant red leather cases, and Proof $50 Silver Coins in red cloth-bound cases.

Brilliant Uncirculated Six Queens coins are available in limited quantities at the official exchange rate . . . $60 for each silver coin, $120 for each gold coin.

BRIDGE

ALAN TRUSCOTT

Looking Good In Two Hats

The best way to present an international bridge match to an audience of several hundred enthusiasts has long been a subject for controversy. In 1958 the Italians produced the first Bridgerama, a complex electrical board on which each card is illuminated until it is played. The audience can therefore see at each stage which cards the players have left in their hands.

This device was rapidly copied throughout the bridge world, but in 1964 a rival appeared. As a minor adjunct to Bridgerama, the American Contract Bridge League employed a Vugraph projector, showing the hands on a screen with an operator writing in the bids and crossing off the played cards.

As time went on the Vugraph became more sophisticated, and it is now preferred in most parts of the world for very practical reasons. Although slightly less spectacular than Bridgerama, which is still favored in some European countries, it is far easier to operate, transport and store, and requires a much smaller staff.

Operating a Vugraph requires perfect concentration and considerable bridge expertise. The world's best, by common consent, is Chuck Lamprey of White Plains, N. Y., who has officiated at several international events. When not operating his Vugraph, he is a player in the top rank and demonstrated it by overcoming a bad trump break on the diagramed deal from tournament play.

Lamprey and his partner were using the Blue Team Club system, in which a jump shift promises a strong suit but not necessarily a strong hand. When South eventually showed heart control by bidding five hearts, North decided that the diamond void was just what his partner needed.

Against six spades West led the diamond king, which was ruffed in dummy. The spade jack was played, winning the trick when East played low and revealing the bad trump break. Next the declarer led club winners from the dummy, expecting to be able to discard diamond losers. But East ruffed the second round and South had to overruff.

Now Lamprey made the key play by cashing his three heart winners. It was unlikely that East would be able to ruff; and if he could, there was no hope, barring a defensive error. A diamond ruff then left this position:

♡ J
♣ Q86

WEST

◇ A10
♣ J97

EAST
♠ A8
◇ Q98

♠ KQ6
◇ J7

The club queen was now led from dummy, and East had to choose. He could have ruffed with the spade ace and led his remaining trump to stop a diamond ruff, but South would then have been able to throw his last diamond on the heart jack. East therefore ruffed low, but South was still in command. He overruffed, ruffed a diamond and threw his last diamond on the heart jack. The spade ace was the only trick for the defense and the slam was made.

West led the diamond king.

AROUND THE Garden

JOAN LEE FAUST

This Week:

If gray snow mold was a lawn problem this spring, application of fungicides now should be considered. Confer with local Cooperative Extension offices before proceeding for county area recommendations. . . . Scurry to finish all outdoor chores.

Carrot Bonanza

The carrot harvest this year is tremendous. That's right. The crop started coming in two weeks ago in time for a beef stew and it is still coming with many more rows to harvest. With a thick mulch of fallen leaves between the rows to stave off any frosts, the carrot tops are nestled from the chilly weather and the ground remains open for easy harvest.

The secret to success was sowing the seed on a sunny September afternoon when the ground was warm and moist. Since the growing season was shortening, the trick was to sow shorter carrots. Instead of the usual seven to eight-inch length, these are four inches long. There are many excellent short-length carrots available with superb sweet flavor. They include Short 'n Sweet, Sucram and Touchon. All of them are 70 to 75 day crops and each root has brilliant orange color.

All sorts of root crops can be grown this way. Parsnips are a natural. In fact parsnip perfectionists will not even pull their first crops until the ground has chilled down and all earthlings are shivering from the cold. Beets grow well this way too and so do turnips.

For these late root crop harvests, be sure the soil does not crust over. The best deterrent is a thick mulch of leaves, salt hay, compost or straw. Even if there is snow on the ground, the mulch layer will keep the ground open to pull the roots easily. Hopefully the carrots will last until Thanksgiving Day maybe Christmas if they are not all gobbled up before hand.

Answers/Questions

FORCING LILIES (Oct. 24)
K.E.W., Apple Valley, Pa. asked if anyone had ever tried to force hardy lilies in pots, and if so, how it was done. We consulted Stanley Bulpitt, Brookside Nurseries, Darien, Conn. who won many awards for his outstanding garden displays of forced bulbs and perennials at New York's International Flower Shows. According to Mr. Bulpitt, the trick to forcing lilies is to obtain pre-chilled bulbs from bulb suppliers specializing in bulbs for forcing. (Pre-chilling allows bulbs to cure.) Pot lily bulbs individually in compost-enriched soil, water and store at temperatures of 32 degrees for four weeks to root. Pots can be stored in a coldframe or buried in the ground and protected so they do not freeze. After roots form, bring into temperatures of 50 degrees for a week or so, then 60 degrees to grow. Lilies planted by the end of this month should bloom around mid-February. If pre-chilled lily bulbs are not available, follow the same directions but store pots at near freezing temperatures six to eight weeks for the curing/rooting period.

LATE LAWN SEEDING (Oct. 24)
P.N.L., Brooklyn, N.Y., asked how late in the season grass seed can be sown safely. She had heard it can be sown on top of snow. We consulted Robert O'Knefski, turf grass specialist with Nassau County Cooperative Extension. He said that grass seed can be sown as late as the ground can be worked. Bluegrass especially can be sown late, but with fescues, there may be some loss of germination. The grass seed remains dormant until spring. Grass seed can be sown on top of snow, but this method is not recommended. Germination is questionable because the seed does not come in direct contact with prepared soil.

GERANIUM LEAVES WHITE (Oct. 31)
O.E., Manhattan, asked why many leaves of apparently healthy geraniums turn completely white. We consulted Howard Wilson, president of Wilson Brothers nursery, geranium growers in Roachdale, Inc. He has noticed the phenomenon of all-white leaves in geraniums but "it doesn't happen that often," he says. "It can be attributed to excessive heat. Sometimes plants in the greenhouse in summer show evidence of this if the temperatures get too hot. Also, the phenomenon does sometimes occur with the fancy-leaved, but these are mutations and cannot be propagated. Ideal growing temperatures for geraniums are 70 to 75 degrees with a 10 degree drop at night."

HOUSE PLANTS FOR SHADE (Oct. 31)
M.R., Edison, N.J. asked what house plants will thrive best in shade. Maury Buxbaum, a Long Island teacher, writes, "As a biology teacher I am always interested in finding house plants that thrive in a shady classroom and home. For low light with some sky light or near lamps, try: dumbcane (Dieffenbachia); Dracaenas, syngonium, snake plant, Fittonia, prayer plant (Maranta); aspidistra, philodendron, some ivies, ferns, palms, peperomia and Chinese evergreen. Fo[r] without sun, but go[od] African violets, Rex [bego]flera, pothos, screw [pine], rubber plant, pilea, caladium."

hay, straw, or evergreen branches can be tied around. Keep it loose to allow some aeration.

Anti-desiccant sprays which coat evergreen leaves will help overcome windburning, which is caused when foliage transpires more moisture than it is able to replace from frozen soil. The coating sloughs off when growth begins in spring.

The plants that most require anti-desiccants include rhododendrons, hollies, leucothoes, mahonias, with emphasis on English boxwood.

An anti-desiccant spray is applied in November or early December when the temperature is in the 40's and will remain so for about 24 hours. A second coating is recommended in late February or early March on a mild day. The new Wilt-Pruf NCF can be applied only once.

Few plants require winterizing more than roses. In spite of the best care, hybrid teas, grandifloras, floribundas are susceptible to winterkill. This means replacement. Much can be avoided by a few basic rules of winter care.

A deep blanket of snow that comes early and lingers until spring is the best rose insulator, but it cannot be guaranteed. The traditional method—and still foolproof—is to hill "tender" and fall-planted roses with soil to a depth of at least eight inches, better a foot, placed directly over the crown.

Do not scrape soil from around rose plants as this exposes roots. Dig it from another part of the garden, and if heavy lighten with peatmoss, sand, or perlite. After placing the soil in position, pound it with the back of a shovel or the feet to firm and eliminate air. When soil freezes solidly, cover with marsh hay, straw, evergreen branches, or other light, airy material that does not mat.

Equally simple and effective are plastic rose collars, a foot long and seven inches high, they are placed around each plant. Before a hard freeze, centers are filled with well drained soil from another part of the garden. Mulching is not needed, and roses go through the winter safely within these attractive muffs.

More demanding are tree roses. The old-fashioned technique was to lift and bury plants in a trench. Another way is to dig a trench at one side, loosen the roots, and bend the trunk over, nearly level with the ground. Then plants are covered with marsh hay, straw, litter, or even soil.

Where not too cold, with temperatures well below zero, trunks of plants can be covered with tree wrap, wrapped with straw or marsh hay, including tops, then sealed with several layers of burlap. Available are expensive tree rose winterizers made of a polyvinylchloride frame with aluminum folding arms and insulating foam sides. These are serviceable for many years.

City gardeners, with plots and patios encircled on all sides, are not absolved. In these enclosures wind that whirls about can cause considerable damage of many kinds. Make certain on-the-ground terraces are firm. Unless placed on layers of sand, bricks and paving will be lifted up with the alternate freezing and thawing of the soil. If concrete among bricks, flagstones, or slabs is missing, replace it before winter sets in. Penthouse gardeners should check their brick work and paving as well.

In courtyards, trees and shrubs often do not need wrapping, but require equal pruning and bracing, as heavy accumulations of snow are blown in, resulting in irreparable breakage.

Check to see that penthouse climbing roses and other vines are well secured. See to it that espaliers are firmly anchored, and if clay and plastic pots are to remain outside, empty of soil and place upside down to prevent cracking.

Clean and bring in lightweight figures and ornaments unless they are completely weatherproof. This applies to all gardens—city or country.

Store vulnerable furniture. If it must stay outdoors, cover well with large sheets of plastic that will protect from snow, rain, and sun.

Winterizing the garden involves more. Look around to determine its needs. Keep an old broom or long stick handy to shake snow off evergreens when newly fallen, but do not disturb if frozen, as branches may snap.

To avoid slipping on sidewalks, driveways, and walks, apply clean sand, as salt is damaging to plants. Injury shows up in early summer as browned leaves and twigs.

When no longer needed, clean tools and rub with linseed oil to extend their life. Have power mowers and other mechanical equipment checked by experts to be ready to use in spring.

Empty the hose of water and tie with string, and hang on wall out of the way. Shut off outdoor faucets to prevent pipes from freezing. Finally, decorate window boxes and other containers with greens, red ruscus, strawflowers, bayberry, and bittersweet. ■

potlight on the Accountants

Pressure Mounts in Congress For Closer Scrutiny of the Men Who Audit the Books

It has n listening to a chorus of com- from constituents who lost n the Equity Funding Scandal, n and bust of National Student g and other investment de- recent years.

did all this happen? Why didn't ?" asks a highly critical Con- l aide. "What have [the ac- s] been doing all these years?" part the accounting profes- ill-understood and imperiled, that Congress doesn't want to "They tell us our arguments oo complex, too complicated," lace E. Olson, president of the ember American Institute of Public Accountants.

ul S. Armstrong, chairman of ancial Accounting Standards e profession's influential rule- body, laments: "I don't know in Washington they really know the facts."

e accountants, facing Congres- quisitors will be an unfamiliar tinctly uncomfortable experi- e profession's leading firms in- ag-established symbols of fi- rectitude—such old-line names Waterhouse & Company, & Sells, Ernst & Ernst, and Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Company.

Wherever the profession turns, it sees a Congressional investigation coming at it. At least four committees or subcommittees already have inquiries under way that may lead to largely critical public hearings next year. Considered certain to follow are legislative proposals to curtail the autonomy of certified public accountants, give them new duties and generally recast them as watchdogs over their corporate clients.

A fundamental question will be at the heart of the debate: whether setting accounting rules for American industry has simply become too important a public function to be entrusted largely to a private profession—the C.P.A.'s.

The issue has not been examined since the Securities and Exchange Commission decided almost four decades ago to defer to the accounting profession instead of exercising its own statutory authority to prescribe detailed accounting rules for publicly owned companies. Since then, the accountants themselves have made the rules—under the S.E.C.'s indirect but often pointed and increasingly assertive supervision.

Thus far, little about the accounting profession is escaping Congressional scrutiny: its rule-setting apparatus, its independence (or lack of it) from fee-paying corporate clients, its exercise (or lack of it) of professional self-policing, its concentration into the dominant "Big Eight" international firms, its efforts to devise accounting for inflation.

A less congenial pairing than Congress and the accountants is hard to imagine. On the one hand, Congress: predominantly lawyers, conditioned to dealing with the most momentous issues; annoyed at what they see as a failure by the private sector; feeling pressure to "do something," or appear to be doing something; bumping into accounting considerations on numerous fronts—but still somewhat mystified as to precisely what accountants do.

On the other hand, the accountants: schooled in precise detail, painstaking to a fault; taught by the fact and fear of being sued to circumscribe their responsibilities in narrow terms; unused to heated public debate, but cast in the defensive stance of Big Business, which, by any measure, they have become.

Though the profession has long dealt with the S.E.C., that is not the same as coping with Congress. The profession and the Federal regulatory agency speak the same language, an often technical jargon involving financial disclosure and securities law.

Moreover, regulator and regulated share an interest in the existing arrangements. The agency is spared the rule-making chore, while the profession remains decidedly responsive to its will. "The S.E.C. has the best of all possible worlds," says Michael N. Chetkovich, the institute's chairman. "The rule-maker, whoever it is, is a no-win job."

Why do accountants object to having the rules made in Washington? "Nobody likes to give up power," observes a Congressional critic. For their part, accountants contend that the Government would transform accounting into a labyrinth of inflexible regulations administered by an army of bureaucrats.

They also fear that accounting—like tax law—would be used by Congress as a fiscal tool or for political purposes. "Accounting standards should be as neutral as they possibly can," declares Mr. Armstrong, the standards board chairman.

Accountants nurse painful memories of the investment tax credit, where they concluded that sound accounting dictated one course—gradually crediting the tax benefit to corporate earnings over several years—while tax policy, as an economic stimulant, dictated something else—registering the entire benefit at once. Heeding business complaints, Congress overrode the accountants and permitted companies by law to account for the credit as they wished.

Not everyone gives top priority to maintaining the neutrality of accounting. Some businessmen feel other issues are more important. The severe and contradictory pressures now on Mr. Armstrong's standards board indicate that powerful industries won't sit still for accounting innovations that disrupt their customary financial results. The pressures may be more than any private body can, or should, sustain.

Many C.P.A.'s react to the unaccustomed spotlight with pride as well as apprehension. "Accounting—auditing—has come to maturity. It's damned important. People are realizing that," says Mr. Olson, the institute's president.

In fact, however, public accountants don't do what many people mistakenly believe they do. They don't prepare or assume responsibility for a company's financial reports. (The company does.) They don't tell a company which accounting principles to apply. (They certify whether those that the company chooses fall within an acceptable range, which is sometimes narrow, sometimes quite broad.)

Nor do outside auditors hunt for corporate payoffs or fraud. (To undertake such investigations routinely would be prohibitively expensive, they say. Auditors traditionally have concerned themselves with transactions large enough to affect the fair presentation of financial statements—but how large is large?)

But the profession's leadership can brace for Congressional questioners who may prove stunningly indifferent to the accountants' careful distinctions. "When a constituent's had half a life-

The cost ingredients in a typical layer cake that sells for $1.10 at the store.

Slicing the Food Dollar

By RONA CHERRY

Early last month, Elinor Guggenheimer, New York's Consumer Affairs Commissioner, announced that sugar prices here had dropped from $3.69 for a five-pound bag to $1.25, their lowest point in almost two years. Then, Mrs. Guggenheimer said she couldn't help but wonder why sugar-rich foods had not shown a corresponding decline in price. She is not the only one asking that ticklish question especially in this, the cake and candy holiday season.

Take the run-of-the-mill, one-pound frosted layer cake. According to unpublished figures compiled by the Department of Agriculture, a farmer received 12 cents for all the ingredients that went into such a cake, which in September was commanding about $1.10 at supermarkets. Who is to blame for the cost multiplications? Predictably enough, the accusing fingers point in every conceivable direction.

The farmer, who is perhaps most frequently cast in the role of culprit when food prices rise, is in fact getting less and less of the consumer dollar. According to the Department of Agriculture, price spreads — the difference between what a farmer is paid for his product and what a shopper must pay in the supermarket — were at record levels last August and have come down only slightly since then.

At the supermarket, where shopper outrage is vented most directly, the defense is that the store makes less than a penny of the average sales dollar, which is hardly an indication of heavy profiteering.

Which, presumably, leaves the famous faceless middleman to shoulder the blame. But even a Sherlock Holmes might get lost in the maze of statistics that surround and shadow the complete task of producing a cake for the holiday table. In the baking industry, where the price spread is particularly wide, most companies guard their production cost data in much the same way as most governments guard their secret missile plans. But a number of interviews yield at least a rough idea of how the 12 cents of ingredients become a $1.10 cake.

The first step is taken on the unending fields of the North Central and Midwestern plains states. There, farmers like Earl W. Rosenbaum of Pratt, Kan. grow the wheat that is a cake's most important ingredient—and accounts for 25 percent of the cost of raw materials

Motorola—Minus TV

By RICHARD T. GRIFFIN

CHICAGO—Two years ago last May, Motorola Inc. sold its enormous television set manufacturing business to a Japanese corporation—and all but vanished from public view. Out of sight, perhaps, but into bigger business.

In 1974, Motorola was one of the nation's largest TV makers, but it was losing money at it. The company has spent the last two years trimming away fat, turning around its once-troubled semiconductor division and strengthening its profitable communications and automotive-products divisions. It supplied the two Viking probes on Mars with sophisticated radios and monitoring equipment, and last summer it started building and selling citizens band radios for the first time.

This year, Motorola is on its way to the best financial performance in its history. The company earned $2.19 a share in the first nine months of 1976, 73 cents more than it made in all of 1975, when profits were slashed by the recession. Analysts estimate that when the full year's results are in, they will exceed the record $3.07 a share set in 1973.

William J. Weisz, Motorola's president and chief operating officer, supports that estimate. "We don't predict earnings," he said, "but it's in the right range. Financially, we're in super shape."

Motorola was founded 48 years ago by the late Paul V. Galvin and it has had only two chief executive officers in that time: the founder and his son, Robert W. Galvin, who assumed the title in 1964.

Robert Galvin, now 54 years old, owns along with his family 3.5 million Motorola shares (12 percent of the total). But while he continues to hold the titles of chairman of the board and chief executive officer, both insiders and outside observers say Mr. Galvin no longer runs the company solo, as he once did.

Motorola is run today primarily by Mr. Galvin's two top operating officers—Mr. Weisz, 49, and John F. Mitchell, 48, who was named executive vice president and assistant chief operating officer last year. Observers say the company lost momentum when Mr. Weisz suffered a heart attack in 1972 and was out of action again in 1974 for operations for a coronary bypass and colitis. But he has apparently recovered fully and today works a long, tough schedule.

Messrs. Galvin, Weisz and Mitchell have spent their entire working lives at Motorola. Mr. Weisz and Mr. Mitchell are electrical engineers who came up through the company's all-important communications division. Mr. Galvin studied commerce at Notre Dame University for two years before joining Motorola at the age of 22 to understudy his father.

Today, observers say, Mr. Galvin joins in making the major decisions with the two operating executives, but he does not participate in day-to-day operations. According to one insider, the three work together perfectly, forming a management troika with Mr. Weisz the lead horse.

Not everyone thinks it's all roses, of course. One close observer complained that Mr. Galvin was "out of touch with daily operations, half in and half out, and plays too big a role in the decisions." Decision-making should be left solely to the two operating officers, he felt.

Still, the current way of doing things has left Motorola in "super shape," as Mr. Weisz put it. It wouldn't be had it kept the TV manufacturing business. Although it was the third or fourth biggest maker of television receivers in the country, the Zenith Radio Corporation and the RCA Corporation are the industry's only real giants. The rest of the producers are pygmies, and Motorola was a pygmy.

The company, having invested tens of millions of dollars and some of its best brains in TV, was getting 17 percent of its sales from TV, said Mr. Weisz, but "we didn't make money at it."

Motorola sold $1.7 billion worth of Quasar TV sets in the eight years through 1973, according to a statement filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and for its trouble had to post a net eight-year loss of $3 million. No wonder it wanted out.

The New York Times

William J. Weisz, Motorola president

For something over $100 million, in cash, the Matsushita Electric Industrial Company, maker of electronic products under the Panasonic name, acquired Quasar in May, 1974. The sale, although Mr. Weisz and company couldn't have known it at the time, could not have been better timed from Motorola's point of view.

"I think selling the TV business was one of the all-time coups in American business," said security analyst Otis T. Bradley, senior vice president of Spencer Trask & Company in New York. "They got out gracefully—getting book value, protecting the jobs of employees and so forth. The color TV business went into a downturn just after they sold, and if they had stayed in it and added that headache to their semiconductor problems, they would have been a company in trouble."

Motorola's semiconductor division, headquartered in Phoenix, produces solid-state components and integrated circuits for use in TV sets, tape recorders, automobile ignitions, kitchen-stove controls, variable speed drills and dozens of other products. It has been an erratic performer over the years and it plunged out of sight in the unexpectedly severe recession of 1974-75.

The troubles in Phoenix, said Mr. Weisz, were compounded by "major mismanagement," which he remedied by installing a new set of top officers. The division, he said, now is "performing well and earning reasonably well."

Mr. Bradley is not so sure. "I'm from Missouri when it comes to that division," he said. "The problems of 1974-75 evidenced a very bad loss of control."

Another leading security analyst, from Boston, who asked that his name not be used, commented: "It looks like they're on the right track down there, but they still have a ways to go, a two or three year rebuilding job. They used to be second in the business after Texas Instruments and now I think they're fifth. They're playing catch-up ball."

Playing catch-up ball isn't easy in the best of times, and this isn't the best of times for the semiconductor business, in the view of Stuart M. Johnson, an analyst at Wertheim & Company. He thinks profit margins in the

Notes from the Oil Capital

By JOHN M. LEE

HOUSTON—The toast over drinks at Houston's Petroleum Club is, "Health and hydrocarbons." The first-time visitor is indulged with the explanation that "hydrocarbon" is the chemical term for the petroleum industry and its products. As for "health," well, that seems synonymous with Houston, self-proclaimed oil capital of the world.

It is 11:45 A.M. and the lunchtime crowds are gathering in the elegant club, perched on the 43d floor of the Exxon Building. Houston has been at work for hours. Platt's Oilgram, the industry's daily bible, has been read at 6 A.M., and lights have blazed in skyscraper offices since 7.

On the 42d floor, O. L. Luper, senior vice president of Exxon's chief domestic subsidiary, is saying, "Price decontrol to generate capital is still our biggest problem." In the Petroleum Club, a table of independent oilmen agrees amiably that higher prices have already spurred their own productive efforts and given them a lucrative niche alongside the industry giants.

"The size of the major oil companies doesn't worry me nearly as much as the size of the Federal Government," a driller in a light blue leisure suit drawls.

"Welcome to Texas," a guest is told.

Visitors are advised that the best way to appreciate fast-sprawling Houston is to see it from the air, and, in the grand Texas manner, calling a helicopter is as easy as calling a taxi.

The time is arranged—2 P.M. Tuesday. The pickup spot is designated—a small park across from the Jefferson Davis Hospital. A trip to the airport is a waste of time. At the appointed hour, the Bell aircraft from Houston Helicopters Inc. flutters down from the blue-gray sky and lands in the heart of town.

"When we get more sophisticated, we'll ban this sort of thing," shouts J. L. Taylor, director of economic development for the Houston Chamber of Commerce, as he scrambles aboard.

The visitor is not disappointed. The dense development along the 24-mile Houston Ship Channel, which empties into Galveston Bay and makes Houston a seaport, offers one of the world's great industrial panoramas. This is the center of what's been called the Spaghetti Bowl—well over 1,000 miles of pipelines connecting dozens of chemical plants and refineries, interchanging fuel, feedstocks and chemical products. It's also the nation's largest refining and petrochemical center.

But there is more—thousands of imported Toyotas on the docks, the air hazy with grain dust as ships take on Kansas wheat for Russian consumers, giant cranes loading container ships, United States Steel, Aramco, Goodrich, U.S. Plywood—and in other directions, the huge Houston Medical Center complex, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Astrodome.

"What's important," Mr. Taylor says soothingly over the helicopter's intercom, "is that we have plenty of land for future development."

The high-density industrial district soon gives way to low-density residential areas, where status is measured in trees.

There are far-flung developments of $60,000 to $80,000 homes without a tree around. For $100,000, you can buy a mock chateau but still nothing an Easterner would call a tree. But in the oil industry's residential ghetto known as Memorial—where prices run far higher—there stand the mighty oaks. For the price, you also get a swimming pool with a fancy shape.

From the helicopter, there was not a rectangular pool in sight. The helicopter was $175 an hour.

At the eastern end of the Houston Ship Channel stands Baytown, a gritty industrial city, population 50,000, and home of Exxon's Baytown refinery, soon to be the largest in the United States. A $500 million expansion is to increase capacity to 650,000 barrels of crude oil a day from 400,000, and start-up is expected next spring.

In a reflection of the nation's dwindling energy resources, the expansion will alter some of the refinery's characteristics. For one thing, the enlarged refinery will be 65 percent dependent upon imported oil, instead of 45 percent at present. The commitment to the enlargement was made in the spring of 1973.

"I can tell you," said Pete H. Rohr, headquarters refining operations manager, as he drove along interstate Route 10 toward the 3,100 acre complex of tanks, towers and plumes of steam, "there were many anxious moments in late 1973 and early 1974 [following the Arab oil embargo and cutbacks] when we wondered if we should move forward with the project."

The expansion will cut Baytown's gasoline output to 20 percent of total production from 40 percent. Production of home heating oil, diesel fuel and heavy fuel oil will be increased.

The changed product mix reflects the switch to heavy fuel oil from natural gas under boilers in utility plants. In addition, Exxon expects gasoline consumption to grow at only a 3 percent annual rate to 1980, down from 4 percent annually through 1972 and a 7 percent rate just before the 1973 embargo. Part of the projected slowdown is attributed to slower growth in miles driven.

"But the real change comes in what Detroit has done to improve fuel efficiency, in getting more miles per gallon," said DuVal F. Dickey, an Exxon marketing executive.

Yitzhak Leor, 38, has recently arrived as Israel's consul general in Houston, and he intends to begin an Israeli-American Chamber of Commerce here to promote trade with Israel. Atef Gamal-Eldin, secretary-general of the local American-Arab Chamber of Commerce, wishes him luck but says Houston is destined to be the capital of Arab-American economic relations.

The Arabs, along with the Chinese, Japanese and Europeans, are here to buy oil equipment and expertise. Mr. Gamal-Eldin says, "There is a special warmth and welcome to everyone from the Arab world here in Houston."

Israel's Mr. Leor said that even though Houston's interests are linked to those of the Arab states, he "would like to have relationships with all segments of the Houston business community." He said he hoped businessmen would not be discouraged by the Arab boycott against companies that trade with Israel.

Downtown Houston is a mass of striking office architecture, from the twin trapezoid Pennzoil Towers to One Shell Plaza and the Tenneco Building with its strong vertical lines. In all of these, the refrain is heard of the inhibiting effect of continued price controls. Higher prices are said to be needed to induce additional output, particularly in natural gas.

"What we need is a better regulatory climate to finance the necessary projects," said Robert C. Thomas, manager of international energy contracts for Tenneco Inc., diversified pipeline and shipbuilding company.

Mr. Thomas recalled a recent contract under which Tenneco agreed to land liquefied natural gas from Algeria in New Brunswick, Canada. No price was specified, but similar deals with other companies have commanded the high price of $2.55 a thousand cubic feet (including 30 cents for regassification upon landing and delivery to city terminals).

This compares with an average pipeline price of natural gas of about $1 a thousand cubic feet (mcf) now, a figure most economists agree represents a ridiculous underpricing. Based on its heat content compared with imported oil, natural gas should be about $2 a thousand cubic feet. The Federal Power Commission has held down the price in interstate commerce but has recently approved an increase for newly developed gas to $1.42.

In the free intrastate market within Texas, natural gas rose at one point to about $2.05 but is now back in the $1.70-$1.85 range.

With United States gas supplies dropping rapidly, Mr. Thomas said, "We need more synthetic natural gas as well as liquefied natural gas from abroad." He noted the defeat in Congress of a bill to finance more synthetic fuels research.

"We can gassify coal now for $5 a thousand cubic feet," he declared. When this figure drew a whistle, he said, "That might not be an unrealistic price by the time it comes on stream."

Twenty-seven miles off the Louisiana coast, in 170 feet of shark-infested water, stands a complex of oil and gas production platforms known as West Delta 73. This is an Exxon operation, and Harold Sanders, platform superintendent, flips a dial in the compression house, where natural gas is put under the pressure needed for it to be piped ashore.

The compressor speed is shown at 18,000 revolutions a minute, well below the maximum of 23,000, and Mr. Sanders said, "We could go faster if we had the gas."

The oil and gas are running out here. From a peak of 55,000 barrels of crude oil and 78 million cubic feet of natural gas a day several years back, production from this 86-well operation is down to 23,000 barrels of oil a day and 65 million cubic feet of gas.

Several caveats are in order, and a good deal of care not to project wish-fulfillment onto Chinese realities. Historically, trade has not formed a significant part of the economic makeup of large, self-sufficient continental entities like China.

The radical ideology advocated by the "Four", although used increasingly for petty reasons and the accretion of personal power, is neither something that they created nor something that will disappear with them. Radical egalitarianism, independent and self-reliant modernization and communism are ideals embedded deep in Chinese history, and they represent the aspirations of a large number of Chinese people, in and out of the Communist Party and in posts at all levels of government.

The past 10 years of cultural revolution in China have witnessed the institutionalization of many of the programs advocated by them—mobilizing indigenous talents and methods along with establishing a "modern sector; taking agriculture as the base and industry as the leading factor, decentralization of industry; worker participation in management with cadre and technicians engaging in physical labor; research and education geared to solving practical problems; moral incentives in place of material ones; constant ideological remolding, and breaking down the contradictions of urban and rural life, mental and manual labor.

And in true dialectical fashion, there have been attempts to reinstitute elements of the Soviet model of development which had its heyday in the 1950's.

But as China's uninterrupted social revolution has deepened and intensified, the very baselines for each swing have been altered, so that a complete reversion is totally out of the question. With the downfall of Chiang Ching, Chang Chun-chiao, Wang Hung-wen and Yao Wen-yuan, proponents of the more radical lines have lost their most highly-placed spokesmen, but no Chinese would contend that this meant new "radicals" would not eventually emerge and attempt another cultural revolution.

And as for the "moderates", other than an apparent visceral hatred of the "Four" as people, what else binds them together? Do they all favor the same form and priorities for economic development? It's doubtful.

On the American side, Washington's approval, announced late last month, of the sale of computers with a potential military use signals American eagerness to trade. But, again, trade is tied up with many historical and political factors. The mammoth grain deals of 1973 and 1974 neatly fit into China's pattern of using trade as a carrot at the outset of political relations with other countries. But our lack of movement on implementation of the Shanghai Communique has been paralleled by a plummeting in bilateral trade from $934 million in 1974 to $462.1 million last year, and an expected drop of 9.1 percent to $419.8 million through 1976.

There are concrete signs of renewed interest in trade. China's readiness to accept short and intermediate forms of deferred payments (up to five years), is one, as well as concern with the world's financial situation — Britain's dilemma in particular—combined with interest in how the International Monetary Fund and World Bank go about solving financial problems. The Chinese are developing their transportation infrastructure to support foreign trade expansion, such as building new coastal container facilities, speeding up the modernization of the railway system, buying large numbers of tankers and dredging ports to accommodate large foreign ships. Scientific, technical and trade delegations abroad have specifically mentioned a revived interest in foreign purchases.

But there is a disturbing element in all this. In order to redress its $1.5 billion of unfavorable trade balances of 1973-75, and to service debts incurred, China has cut way back on purchases. According to some estimates, 18 to 23 percent of the favorable foreign trade balance is eradicated through servicing foreign debts (recent prognoses however, have put this figure at 5 to 10 percent by next year). More importantly, in some circles, there is the disturbing sense that China has spent way beyond her means, and short of reversal of past policy that would allow for long-term debts or borrowing, traders are uncertain as to how China will be able to pay for these items.

So with the fair, officially, ending this week, the traders are trying to resolve their own contradictions, between radical optimism and pragmatic caution.

Julian M. Sobin is a senior vice president of the International Minerals and Chemical Corporation.

Lee F. Sobin, the first American woman trader with China, deals in everything from tea to acupuncture equipment.

Mrs. China Trade

By SALLY HEINEMANN

"We hereby pronounce you free of all the bonds of marital burdens. You should consider yourself free of your husband. Never walk in back of him anymore. Never stand and cook in the kitchen for him. Never wait on him." With these words, Lee F. Sobin was declared a liberated woman in a mock ceremony in Canton, in the spring of 1972. Since then, she has worked harder than she ever worked in her life.

A few days after the ceremony, Mrs. Sobin was in business as the first American woman trader with China. It's a business that today accounts for nearly $10 million a year in China trade and represents more than 40 clients, ranging from the Olin Corporation and Abbott Laboratories to the First National Bank of Boston and the Shipstads & Johnson Ice Follies.

It all started about a year after the United States lifted its 22-year-old trade embargo with China, when Mrs. Sobin's husband, Julian, a chemical manufacturer, became part of a small group of Americans invited to attend the May 1972 Canton Trade Fair. Mrs. Sobin went along.

Warmly received by the Chinese, many of whom had never met an American woman, Mrs. Sobin was encouraged to go into business for herself. Accepting the challenge, she cabled her lawyers in Boston (the Sobin's home town) and arranged to start the Friendship International Company. (It was right after President Nixon's visit to China and friendship was the key word at the fair that year.) Armed with a couple of thousand dollars loaned to her by her husband, she bought tea, kites and straw hats.

(Mrs. Sobin had picked up quite a bit of knowledge on the chemical industry and had traveled extensively around Europe, Asia, the Middle East and North Africa, often with her husband on business trips, but her actual work experience consisted only of a short stint during World War II handling publicity for a concert manager in Boston.)

Returning from the fair in June 1972, she easily sold the Chinese goods. But then, mainly because of the publicity surrounding the trip, she was overwhelmed with requests to represent other companies on the mainland.

With only four months to prepare for the next fair, Mrs. Sobin set up shop at the headquarters of Sobin Chemical Inc., of which Friendship International was originally a division. When the sale of Mr. Sobin's business to the International Minerals and Chemical Corporation was completed last year (for $16 million in cash plus other unspecified "considerations"), Friendship became a division of the IMC Chemical Group. Mr. Sobin went along too, and is a senior vice president of IMC.

In the 10 fairs she has attended, plus three additional trips, Friendship has accounted for some $34 million in trade, $12 million in imports for its own account and another $22 million in imports and exports for its clients.

Many of Friendship's clients are companies interested in selling chemical raw materials for China's plastic and steel industries and importing minerals, metals, ores, textiles and shoes.

A new account, the First National Bank of Boston, hopes to eventually establish a correspondent banking relationship to China. An old account, the Ice Follies, has been trying for some time to get its show to China. Sheraton International Inc. (a subsidiary of the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation) is also a client, but Mrs. Sobin says she can't talk about that one for a while.

For its services Friendship International charges up to $10,000 for a contract that generally runs for three fairs (or 18 months) and in addition sometimes receives a commission on trades.

As Mrs. Sobin see it, her job is to gather information on the companies she represents, explain their interest in trading with China and help them to get invitations to do business directly with the Chinese. "The clients can do their own best job," she said. "Our job is to get them to China, show them the ropes and then let them handle their own business."

But some clients who have been invited to China still prefer to have Mrs. Sobin negotiate for them. It seems she has a special rapport with the Chinese.

For Friendship's account, Mrs. Sobin still imports mainly tea and other native produce such as ginger, honey, licorice root, gallnuts and bone glue, which is then sold to distributors. Friendship also imports plastic acupuncture models of a human and a horse for use as teaching aids and acupuncture needles. Among the purchasers: the Harvard Medical School, the University of Pennsylvania Medical School and the Sloan Kettering Institute.

Jim Brooks on the far left and Dale R. Michael in the center are the cofounders of D.P.S. Protective Systems, Inc., a new and highly successful security service business that provides guards and electronic alarm systems to major clients in the metropolitan New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut areas.

The man who helped Mr. Michael and Mr. Brooks realize a lot of their success is their bank. He's Don Sharp of Chemical Bank. Don's a business banking specialist with our Urban Lending Group, part of our network of Chemical Bankers who specialize in business as well as banking.

"Don recognized that we had the ability to make it a success."

Mr. Michael said, "When we were trying to get started, other banks couldn't grasp the potential of our situation. But Don recognized that we had the ability to make it a success. He put together a financing plan that was complex. But it worked. He arranged financing through Chemical Bank's Urban Lending Group, Chemical Bank's Factoring and Finance Division and BanCap Corporation (a bank venture capital group that invests in minority businesses).

"Once we started, we never stopped. Don got us more financing that doubled the size of our business. He introduced us to customers, financed a move to larger quarters, provided a letter of credit for a performance bond that was very important, and set up an efficient account reconciliation plan for us."

"He knows intimately the problems of small businesses and minority businesses."

Mr. Brooks added, "Don is a banker with a broad-based business knowledge. And by learning our business, he's allowed us to grow. He knows intimately the problems of small businesses and minority businesses. And he understands that the problems are essentially the same: the inability to attract capital at a reasonable rate of interest; the difficulty of finding and keeping competent management; and the cost squeeze caused by competition with larger businesses. And Don's perceptive. We don't make a move without calling him."

Our banker is your bank.

Chemical Bank has people who can give you the same kind of help that Don Sharp is giving Dale R. Michael and Jim Brooks. Our banker can provide a large number of banking services. Fast. Without red tape and wasted time. So you have more time to take care of the business end of your business while our banker takes care of the banking end.

Who Gets What Slice of the Food Dollar?

for the average layer cake, according to industry estimates.

Mr. Rosenbaum, who farms more than 600 acres, complains that "The other day I tried to sell my wheat for $2.30 a bushel and was having a hard time even doing that. Consumers think that the average farmer is rich because they remember the record harvests when we got over $5 a bushel. But today it costs me about $2.90 just to raise my wheat, harvest it and get it to a grain elevator. Obviously, we're in bad shape."

At the farm, the wheat is heaped into mounds, loaded onto trucks and sent off to a grain elevator, often owned by the local farmers' cooperative. There the wheat is separated into different grades and sold to large companies, like General Mills or Pillsbury, or to private milling concerns.

At the main grain elevator in Indianapolis, a worker explained that 2.3 bushels of wheat eventually became about 100 pounds of flour. If wheat sells, as it did in July, for a little more than $3 a bushel, it takes upwards of $7 of wheat, then, to make 100 pounds of flour. To that the miller would add about $1 to cover his costs.

"We clean the wheat," said Donald Mennel, president of the Mennel Milling Company of Fostoria, Ohio. "Then we grind and sift it, grind and sift it again." Only the highest quality white flour is used in cakes, he said.

Mr. Mennel's voice hardens when he talks about his profits. "On a $7 or so bag of flour we make seven-tenths of 1 percent profit," he said. "It's miniscule. When people accuse me of being a profiteer, I feel like laughing."

Aside from the wheat, of course, a baker must buy sugar, shortening, eggs and so on to produce the cake, then he must transport the ingredients to a baking plant, which can be expensive indeed. The American Bakeries Company, for instance, ships its milled flour from Ohio to a baking plant in Charlotte, N.C., by rail on the Chessie System at a rate of $1.50 for each 100 pounds of flour.

According to Ned H. Buchholz, district sales manager for the Chessie System in Columbus, a miller will ask for a special railroad car which is waxcoated, like a greased baking pan, so the flour won't stick.

"I suppose we do indeed add to the final price of cake," he said. "But I don't think rail rates add that much. Packaging, grocery stores, all add up. No one takes a bigger hunk than anyone else."

Baking industry sources, however, deny this. The purchasing and transporting of flour and other ingredients to the bakery, they say, amounts to 30 percent of the cost of a finished layer cake.

At the bakery, ingredients undergo a series of quality tests, then are "scaled," or measured out, and dumped into what appears to be a giant mixing bowl. The batter is blended automatically, set by machine into tins and slid into an oven.

At the American Bakeries plant in Charlotte, the pans are checked to make sure they weigh the correct amount. Then, the cakes are baked, taken from their pans and cooled, and sliced, filled and iced. The final step is to slip the cakes into cardboard cartons on which the date, price and unit weight have been stamped.

The process involves human labor at almost every step. Workers constantly monitor cake pans to assure they are filled properly, unload ovens, remove misshapen cakes from the conveyor belts and frequently do the icing.

And, as in any industry, labor rates have climbed in recent years. "Labor costs have jumped so much," said Marcus Chaney, manager of the Charlotte plant, "that my hair has turned gray from sheer worry. We have 500 people involved in production here alone."

According to the W. E. Long Company, a cooperative grouping 80 independent bakers, the wages of a shop worker have risen from $2.71 an hour 10 years ago to $5.52 at present.

"We also have enormous expenses for health, pension and retirement funds," Mr. Chaney pointed out. "It's all bargained in the union contracts."

These increased costs, of course, are reflected in higher prices of the cake. So too are the costs for packaging—paper products, glass and plastic containers. In the brief period from 1973 to 1975 alone, the cost of such materials rose about 35 percent wholesale, in great part because of higher costs for petroleum-based products like plastic wrap and a shortage of fiberboard boxes.

Energy costs also have a direct price impact. "In less than a year, we have had an $88,000 increase in the cost of electricity and energy used to run our equipment such as boilers and ovens," said Mr. Chaney. "All our expenses are what the average person can't understand. If people are looking for a villain in the costs of a cake, they shouldn't look at us."

Labor, energy and packaging costs total another 30 percent of the wholesale price of cake.

> The refrain is: 'If people are looking for a villain, they shouldn't look at us.'

Beyond that, there is transportation of the finished product to 7-Eleven stores, A.&P. supermarkets and other outlets, which accounts for the largest remaining part of the bill for cake.

"We'll put 500 vanilla layer cakes, 150 pound cakes, 300 chocolate cakes and cookies into a truck," said Robert R. Barton, vice president of purchasing at American Bakeries headquarters in Chicago. "The truck will transport the cakes to a depot sometimes hundreds of miles away."

Layer cakes, for example, sold under the Mickey Cake, Merita and Cookbook names, are tshipped to Anderson, S.C., about 130 miles away from American Bakeries' Charlotte plant. At Anderson, they are loaded onto local route trucks, each with a route salesman, who is paid a salary and commission by American Bakeries.

The route salesman, in fact, is typically the next-to-last link in the farmer-to-supermarket chain.

In Brooklyn, Dominick Palumbo, who works as a route salesman for Drake Bakeries, said he stops at 27 stores each day, getting nine-and-a-half cents on each dollar of cake he sells them, Mr. Palumbo said he earned $19,500 last year. He is highly critical of what he sees as unjust accusations by the bakeries that route salesman are responsible for high cake costs.

"Companies take advantage by blaming their high prices on energy or deliverymen," he said.

"All they do is tell you about their expenses when they talk about the high price of cake," he said. "But that's baloney. Their profits are enormous."

Nevertheless, many bakers insist that sales and delivery expenses claim a large part of their profits.

Fuel costs amount to 60 cents a mile for the big transport trucks that serve the depots, according to Al Meyers, a spokesman for W. E. Long. "Then it costs about 26 cents a mile to run a route truck," he said. "Three years ago it was 19 cents. Fuel has gone up nearly 60 percent and there have been higher charges for maintenance, equipment and labor involved in the driving of trucks."

Baking industry spokesmen claim that with added administrative and advertising costs, along with miscellaneous expenses, they end up making less than a penny net profit on each pound of cake.

Finally, every day, the fresh cakes arrive at local stores. Most supermarket chains, A.&P. and Grand Union among them, then end the cake's odyssey with a markup of about 20 percent.

That might sound like a lot to some people, but as a spokesman for A.&P. explained, "A food store's gross margin on products must go to pay all its bills, including rent, labor, utilities, taxes, packing and the like."

And so the charges and countercharges fly. If it's any consolation to cake-lovers, middlemen's costs are expected to keep prices up on the whole range of food products—from lettuce to corn flakes.

"In 1976, consumers will probably spend 3 to 5 percent more for food produced on United States farms than the $159 billion which they spent last year," said Terry L. Crawford, a Department of Agriculture economist. "Higher marketing costs, or what people call middleman costs, will be the largest contributor to th

Thinking about a retirement program?

The East New York Savings Bank presents a "comparison-shopping" guide to Individual Retirement Accounts and Keogh Plans.

Perhaps you're one of the many thousands of people for whom retirement-planning is a matter of personal responsibility. You may not be covered by a company plan where you work—so your opportunity exists through an Individual Retirement Account. Or you may be self-employed in business or a profession, in which case you qualify for the Keogh Plan.

In either case, as the year-end approaches, you may be actively thinking about starting your program both for its long-range benefits and for the immediate tax advantages you'll realize.

If you're at this stage, you're probably aware that an IRA or Keogh Plan can be built around a number of different investment methods. Mutual funds, for example...annuity plans...savings-bank accounts...endowment policies...stocks and bonds...or a combination of these methods.

At The East New York Savings Bank, we believe that a crucial decision like retirement-planning demands—first and foremost—a clear understanding of the very significant differences between these methods. You owe it to yourself and your family to know which programs entail risk...whether there are sales fees involved...whether annual charges might affect the growth of your program ...how much it may cost you to redeem the proceeds of your fund...and much more.

In short, you should be armed with the questions—and answers—that can help you choose the correct program right at the outset.

To this end, we've prepared a comparison-table that highlights some of the basic differences between the choices that are currently open to you. It's well worth your study; perhaps you'll even want to review it with those who may be advising you on retirement matters.

With the information our chart contains—you'll now be able to ask some vital questions when someone tries to sell you an IRA or Keogh retirement package.

- Is my money insured in any way?
- Is my rate of return guaranteed?
- Will I be charged a fee when it comes time for me to get my money out?

Sure they're tough questions; but when your future security is at stake, does it pay to be anything but tough-minded?

You'll note in the comparison-table that one method offers total security through a fixed, guaranteed rate of return—and, at the same time, contains no hidden costs to erode your principal. It's a savings bank thrift program: the kind we offer at The East New York Savings Bank. We think the facts speak for themselves concerning the prudence of choosing such a program for your hard-earned dollars.

With many of the other methods you may need luck in reaching your goals. With ours, all it takes is patience.

If you'd like complete details on an IRA or Keogh Plan at The East New York Savings Bank—and further information on their advantages vis-a-vis other "investments"—this coupon will put things into motion.

g the stock market from the ve of Bridgeport, Conn., John Winthrop Wright, President of Wright Investors Service, thinks that President-elect Carter "will be favorable for the stock market."

Among the issues he favors are Masco, Masonite and Johns-Manville in the construction and housing sector, as well as "solid growth stocks like Coca-Cola and Minnesota Mining."

Retail-oriented stocks, including Petrolane and Standard Brands Paint, also appear on Mr. Wright's buy list. This reflects Wall Street's interest in Mr. Carter's citing of a tax cut for the "average American family" as a possibility early in 1977.

With these tax-freed dollars in mind, some Wall Streeters already are recommending the purchase of retail-chain issues (a laggard group so far this year), as well as food chains and tobacco stocks, issues that are regarded as more "defensive" in terms of market strategy.

Mr. Wright believes that stock prices generally will soar to new highs next year, but it might be noted that he favors "companies doing most of their business in the United States rather than abroad." Even Jimmy Carter, it appears, is not expected to invigorate the generally sluggish world economy.

By the same token, there is certainly no guarantee that Wall Street analysis will invigorate the stock market.

Thomas J. Holt, for one, believes that Jimmy Carter "is almost certain to artificially depress interest rates in the years ahead." But at that point, Mr. Holt, who runs an advisory service and has been bearish on stock market prospects for at least a year, definitely parts company with most Wall Streeters.

He envisages a business contraction that, by 1977-78, could turn into a depression. As for the stock market, he regards the retreat that began in mid-September as the start of a severe setback.

Accordingly, his present strategy is to recommend that investors allocate 35 percent of their capital to gold and other precious metal stocks, 30 percent to outright short sales, 25 percent to quality corporate bonds (whose prices would rise as interest rates came down) and the remaining 10 percent to high-yielding utilities and convertible debentures.

His short-sale candidates range from Citicorp, Coca-Cola and Merck to Revlon, Schlumberger and Texas Instruments.

But for investors who see the Georgia-born President-elect's magic rubbing off on the stock market, Standard & Poor's Corporation suggests another approach: "Investing in the Sunbelt."

It has tabulated several dozen publicly-owned companies with important representation in the Sunbelt and picks four stocks as "particularly attractive" —the Liberty Corporation, primarily a life insurance concern; Texas Commerce Bancshares, the nation's 26th largest banking organization; Gifford-Hill, whose interests range from farm irrigation to truck transportation, and the Enserch Corporation, an integrated natural gas company formerly known as Lone Star Gas.

"HOW I SAVED MY ACCOUNTANT $1,130 IN TAXES."

I'm Gerry Bissinger of Lebenthal. And with as little effort as an accountant counting exemptions on a 1040, in 12 months I saved my own accountant $1,130 in taxes.

I did it with $80,000 in short term tax-free Municipal Bonds as against $80,000 he had been keeping in treasury bills.

After taxes in the 50% bracket, he was netting only $3,310 from his treasuries. The municipals I sold him (in 1974) paid him $4,440 a year completely tax free. A saving in the municipal of $1,130.

Those particular bonds have matured and paid off. But today with 1-year treasuries at about 5.15% and, say, 1-year State of New York Municipal Bonds around 4.00%—tax free—he'd be $1,140 ahead buying the 1-year municipal.

I can't promise I'll save you $1,140 in taxes. But depending on your tax bracket, the municipals you buy, whether you hold them to maturity, local taxes where you live, and on other things I have to know about you, I ought to be able to save you something.

Call me at Lebenthal. I'm out to save you money in taxes and be your hero.

How I saved a lady doctor $1,894 in taxes.

I'm afraid of needles. She was afraid of anything smacking of investment. So her money sat in the bank, and taxes ate up the interest—until I entered the picture with A-rated or better, long term, triple tax exempt Municipal Bonds.

Under present law, the bond of any municipality in New York State is free to her as a New Yorker of all three taxes that residents have to pay on savings bank interest.

So, on the $52,000 that she's put into the municipals of various towns in New York State in the past two years, she's getting a current return of $3,210 a year, and it's completely tax free.

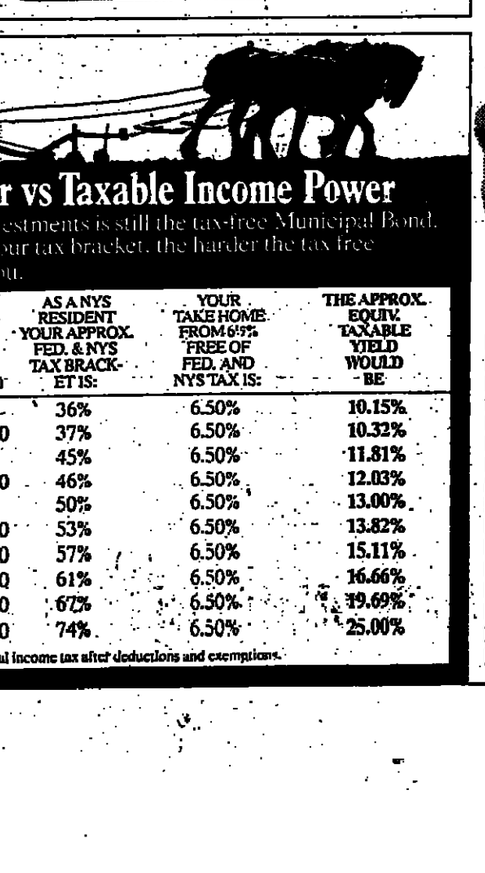
If she'd put that same $52,000 in the bank for six years at 8.17%—all she'd keep after city, state, and federal income taxes in the $50,000 income bracket (she's married and files a separate return) is $1,316.

The saving to her in her municipals is $1,894.

In fairness to banks, let me say, put a thousand in, get a thousand out. And I can't tell you how much you'd get from a municipal bond if you had to sell before maturity.

So, before I recommend a bond for you, I want to know you and your needs. For liquidity? For current income? For long term gains? Or for something else?

I'm Ron Weinress, and matching the right bond to my customers' needs is how I get to be a hero at Lebenthal.



Horsepower vs Taxable Income Power

The workhorse of investments is still the tax-free Municipal Bond. Because the higher your tax bracket, the harder the tax free municipal pulls for you.

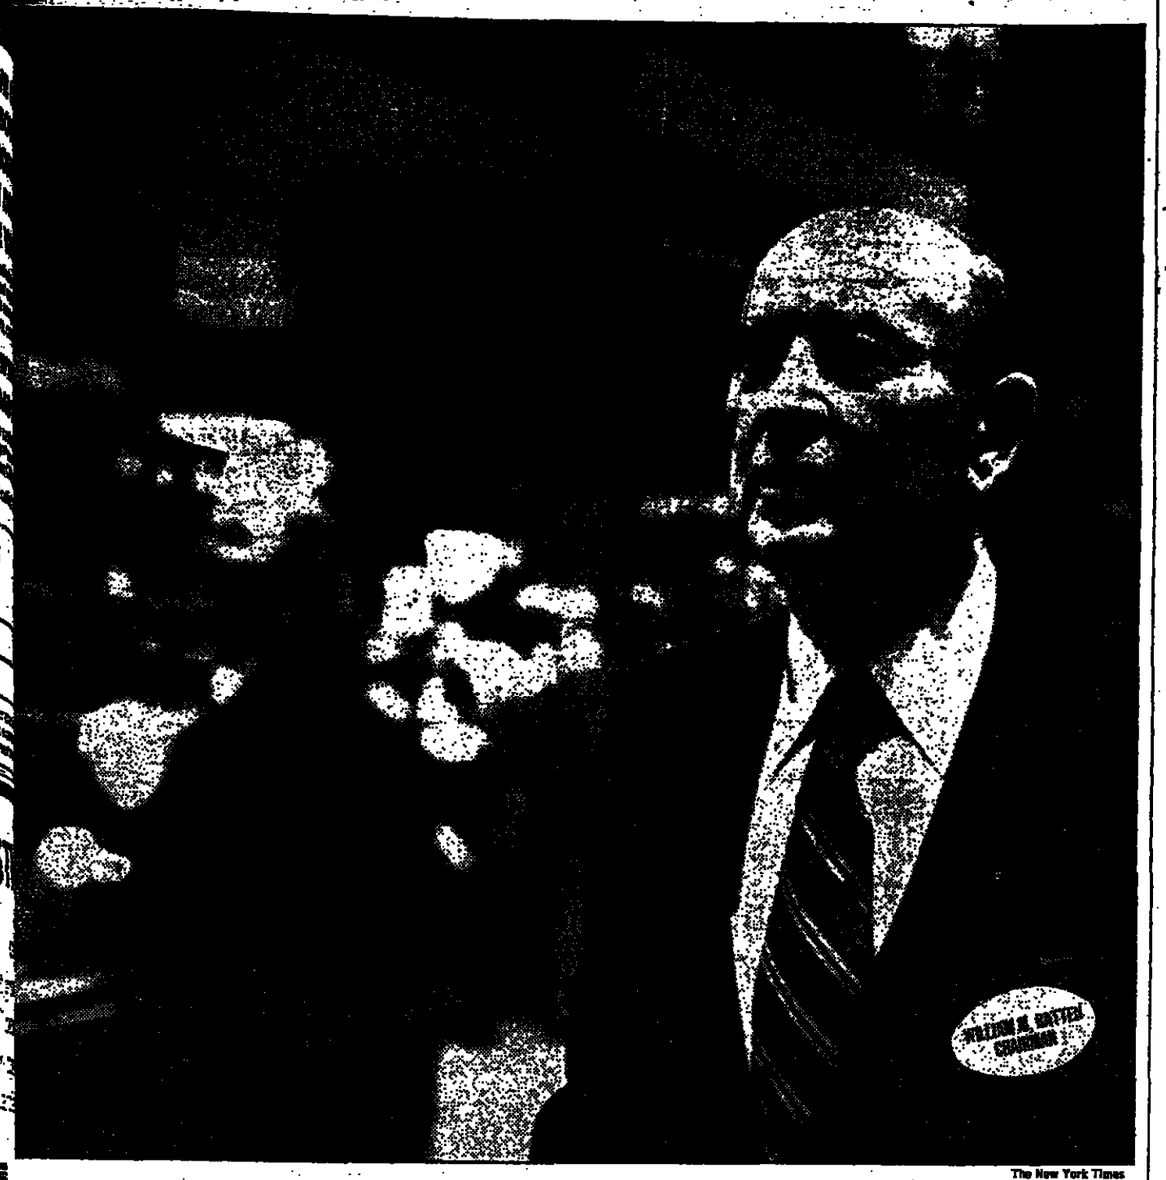
Merchant Chief at the Big Board



The New York Times

William M. Batten—the nation's most visible spokesman for Wall Street.

By LEONARD SLOANE

story of William M. Batten, chairman chief executive officer of the New Stock Exchange, could be summas "A Tale of Two Reports."

first was on the character and poli- the J. C. Penney Company in 1957, hich Mr. Batten, then a vice president e big retailing chain, developed the that the company had failed to pro- enough dimension for growth. Mr. n was named chief executive of Pen- he following year.

ring his tenure there, he led the com- into a new and expansive era — and e time he retired in 1974, he had d push its sales from $1.4 billion to $7 billion, had raised its profits from nder $50 million to more than $119 n and had increased the number of Penney stores from fewer than 1,700 re than 2,000.

second report that figured promi- in his career was issued last January ig Board directors' committee headed r. Batten. It called for vast changes traditional but heavily criticized d of allocating stocks to Big Board lists—the individuals who make the ts.

report went straight to the heart American system of trading securi- nd made enemies—as well as friends the former J.C. Penney executive. pact, along with Mr. Batten's ready of so many technical points in an ry where he had never before d, led to his election as head of the ge four months later at a point an era of change was also looming all Street.

, after nearly six months behind the nan's desk in the building at 11 Wall that houses the nation's largest se- s exchange, the man whom friends Mil"—for Milfred, his middle name— y aware of the severity of the prob- f the new era. He is equally aware sniping of those on and off the ge who feel that the challenge may ely be too much for him.

re are some people who say that ve grown up in a business, no way you can manage it," he the other day. "I don't agree with The common denominator is manag- ople and the techniques are the same er it's the 1,500 people we have here 200,000 people we had at Penney's." the age of 67, the 5-foot-11, balding ive gives the impression of being fit ctive as he goes about the job of g the exchange and serving as the 's most visible spokesman for Wall if not for the capitalist system it-en Mr. Batten retired from Penney, r B. Wriston, chairman of Citicorp, him "wiser than a treeful of owls"— ignation that might be changed to tire parliament of owls if he can ain the Big Board's profitable domi- of the nation's securities trading years ahead.

example, the entire securities indus- moving, under the prodding of the ities and Exchange Commission, itself, is under the prodding of Con- to develop a national market system e buying and selling of stocks and . Any diversion of trading from the oard to another exchange or market r would reduce the income of an im- nt and vocal group of New York ex- e members—its specialists—and in- Mr. Batten in the same kind of inter- e warfare among member firms that ed his predecessor, James J. Need- who departed abruptly last May.

e're facing a securities industry envi- ent that is trending toward more com- petition and we must not lose sight of the reason for our existence," Mr. Batten said. "People of good will can have differences of opinion, but what we are trying to do is to provide the best-quality mechanism for the trading of securities in the world."

Mr. Batten and his exchange are also wrestling with present competitive situations, as well as those yet to come. In recent weeks and months, new developments have included intra-exchange competition among specialists on the Big Board and inter-exchange competition among specialists on the New York and American exchanges.

"Every time this comes up, I always ask myself: does it improve the quality of the market," he observed. "One shouldn't expect too much too soon. I don't think enough time has elapsed to know what the outcome of this whole competition has been."

The word "competition" comes easily to Mr. Batten, who spent his entire career at J.C. Penney competing against other chain stores, department stores and specialty stores for the loyalty of the consumer. And even though he has moved into what he terms "a different culture," the lexicon of merchandising is still more familiar to his lips than the vocabulary of the financial world.

In taking the job, he negotiated a 5-year, $2 million contract with an annual escalator.

Born in Reedy, W. Va., as the oldest of three children, Mr. Batten began working part-time for Penney in Parkersburg, W. Va., as a salesman while still in high school. He entered Ohio State University in 1928 and graduated four years later during the early and bitter days of the Depression.

"It was really rough on his parents, but we managed to see him through college," said his mother, Mrs. Gurry Batten Seaman. Speaking the other day from her home in Kisseme, Fla., she remarked that her husband was then a general merchandise wholesaler and was able to provide the tuition and living expenses for her son. "He got a fellowship to go on to the University of Chicago and went there for a few months, but we had to bring him home because we had another son in college at the time," she said.

Mr. Batten's brother Gene, who still lives in Parkersburg and is also in the retail business, remembered that Mil did not go into retailing right after graduation. There were a couple of other ventures first, he said, before Mr. Batten went to work on a full-time basis for the retailing company that was to be his home for the next 39 years.

Initially he and a partner rented a farm in the area and turned it into a commercial public golf course. Then he took a sales job with a food company, which lasted only a short time because he refused to pad his expense account, as the other salesmen did. When he resigned, his boss warned him, "You'll never amount to much in business."

By 1935 Mil Batten knew that Penney was where he wanted to be. He returned to the company and started as a salesman in Lansing, Mich. His brother-in-law, Philip H. Young, jokingly recalled recently that Mr. Batten always managed to find something else to do when packing cases had to be opened in the store. "He always had his shirt off, but I never saw him at either end of a box," Mr. Young said.

During World War II Mr. Batten served in the office of the Quartermaster General in Washington as a lieutenant colonel. According to Mr. Young, Mr. Batten was offered the opportunity to become a brigadier general if he remained in the service after the war but decided to return to Penney instead.

His rise through the ranks was rapid: assistant to the president in 1951, vice president in 1953 and member of the board of directors in 1955. Two years later came that now-famous first report. "Much of my time this year has been devoted to thinking about the future of the company" was Mr. Batten's opening line—and, as they say in show business, a star was born.

After he retired from Penney at the age of 65 in 1974, his wife Kathryn hoped that they would have more time to travel and to visit their winter home on Johns Island, Fla. But Mr. Batten immersed himself in his outside directorships—which included the Big Board, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Boeing Company, in addition to Penney—and was happiest when he was busiest.

"I am not a golfer, I get bored when I go fishing and I guess since I've worked all my life, I have always had a lot of fun working," he said. "If I could think of any more ways to have fun than working, I would stop working and do that."

Mr. Batten had been a public director of the New York Stock Exchange since 1972, arriving at the time that the exchange was reorganized and Mr. Needham became its first full-time chairman. Although Mr. Batten was an outsider, he quickly became conscious of the upheaval in Wall Street, as negotiated commission rates, the third market and the 1975 Securities Act Amendments were making a major impression on the exchange as an institution. He also saw, as time passed, that Mr. Needham seemed to be losing support.

Late in 1974 Mr. Batten was named chairman of the committee to study the stock allocation system—which ultimately produced the report on the specialist system. During the 15 months that he spearheaded this group, spending much of his time at an office in the exchange's building, he broadened the committee's mandate to include a redefinition of the exchange's role in the years ahead.

Therefore, when he was offered the Big Board's chairmanship last May after support for Mr. Needham had all but evaporated, Mr. Batten found himself in a position to accept, in light of the broad constituency he seemed to have generated.

In taking the job, he negotiated a contract in keeping with some of the publicized sports and entertainment pacts of the day—a five-year, $2-million payout involving an escalating salary each year. He also undertook, with relish, the long working days, frequent evening meetings and national travel schedule that go with being Wall Street's chief spokesman.

Mr. Batten talks of remaining in the job as long as his health permits. The exchange's power structure, which has resented activist leaders in the past, seems delighted—so far—with his performance.

As for Mr. Batten himself, Wall Street appears to be growing as a subject of his affection even rivaling his feeling for retailing. "I love the retail business and that's why I like the floor of the exchange," he said. "It's like a store at Christmas time."

Tax-free income, low expenses and no sales charge.

Fidelity Municipal Bond Fund has an immediate appeal to the wise investor. Our low fee (4/10 of 1% of the Fund's net assets) can help generate greater tax-free income for you.

If our expenses were higher your net income would naturally be less. Conversely, a fund with higher costs would probably have to assume greater risk to offer the same return.

Moreover, our Fund has no sales charge or redemption fee. All your investment dollars go to work at the outset seeking as high a level of tax-free income as is consistent with the preservation of capital.

These points demand comparison. Here are others.

Fidelity Municipal Bond Fund offers all of these benefits.

1. Daily tax-free income.

Though Marshall Armstrong, its chairman, protested the Moss subcommittee's findings as hasty, preconceived and unfair, thus far for the standards board, rule-making is proving to be a no-win job. The board is simultaneously beset by businessmen, who see peculiar changes in their financial statements and blame accountants who, they feel, are obsessed with theory, and by other accountants, critical of what they view as untidy compromises.

No critic of the board has been more persistent than Harvey Kapnick, chairman of Arthur Andersen & Co., one of the Big Eight firms. Last week he urged the private sector to take immediate steps to correct the board's "lack of performance" before Congress takes over the job.

The accountants also are nervously awaiting a thick report expected next month from a Senate Government Operations subcommittee headed by Lee Metcalf, Democrat of Montana. The subcommittee's small staff has put a year into digging out what should easily stand as the most extensive report ever compiled on the business of public accounting.

The Metcalf inquiry will draw on a detailed survey of the dominant Big Eight public accounting firms, based on a questionnaire inquiring about their size, the nature of their practice, and their revenues from Government contracts. The investigation is also focusing on the accounting institute and the standards board.

One point of keen interest is the standards board's financing. It has an annual budget of $4.25 million, which is based mainly on contributions from accounting firms and corporations, including $1.6 million from the Big Eight. "On its surface, everyone involved in financing this industry group has a vested interest," said Jack Chesson, a Metcalf staff member, early in the inquiry.

The accountants' leadership will be astonished if the Metcalf subcommittee's report isn't acutely critical. They see Senator Metcalf as bent on proving a conspiracy among accountants, clients, and standards board, and they fear Congress will embrace the report as its bible on accounting.

The accounting leadership will be astonished if Senator Metcalf's report is not acutely critical.

Mr. Armstrong, wincing from the drumbeat of business complaints, says of the Metcalf inquiry: "If they are willing to look at the record, it comes out very clear that we are not in cahoots, so to speak, with American business." He says corporations are following the board's pronouncements "more or less under duress."

The coming Congress will almost certainly again consider Senator William Proxmire's legislation on corporate payoffs. The measure passed the Senate, 86-to-0, only for the House version to die in last session's waning hours.

The Proxmire legislation included two S.E.C. proposals that show how Washington and the accountants see things differently. The measure, considered mild by its proponents, would have made it a crime for a company to fail to maintain adequate internal controls or for an individual to make false statements to an auditor.

The accounting institute opposed both steps as impractical, irrelevant, probably redundant, and pernicious. In particular, it attacked the proposed penalty on false statements, arguing the move would dry up communications from third parties (bankers, for example) whose cooperation is essential to an audit. The institute urged that the penalty apply only to deliberate false statements in writing by employees of a company being audited.

The bill's proponents, who meant the measure to strengthen the auditor's hand, were puzzled and angered. "Of all the people who shouldn't be fighting us on this," fumed Robert L. Kuttner, a Proxmire aide. "What galled us," he went on, "is that if you look at this whole bribery scandal, it never would have happened if the accountants were doing what they were supposed to."

Also expected to resume next session is a Senate Commerce Committee inquiry into corporate accountability. It is pursuing proposals by Ralph Nader, who urges a mandatory rotation of outside auditors every five years. Just getting under way is a House Ways and Means subcommittee inquiry inspired by Charles A. Vanik, the Ohio Democrat. By reputation a bitter antagonist of the large, multinational corporations, Mr. Vanik was first drawn to accounting by the difficulty of determining from a corporation's financial reports how much Federal taxes it actually pays. He is also looking critically at the standards board.

pp, president of Jay Foods
laims his share of the local market has jumped a couple of points, to 82%. Pringle's hit the Chicago market in 1973 before going national, when Jay, like the rest of the industry, was already in a tough position because of record potato shortages and soaring costs. Nevertheless Jay dove into an expensive direct advertising blitz that promptly shattered Pringle's.

Although there's been steady growth in the larger companies like Jay Foods, the business remained basically regional because potato chips have short, six-week shelf lives and must be shipped by local distributors to each supermarket. Pringle's, on the other hand, was created to overcome this problem. Made from dehydrated potato mash mixed with mono-and di-glycerides and butylated hydroxyanisole—as competitors are quick to point out—Pringle's has a two-year shelf life.

Curious customers across the country swarmed to stores to buy the novel potato chips, but evidently many stopped coming after they got through the first couple of cans. The most commonly repeated slur against Pringle's is that they "taste like cardboard."

"Pringle's" is a major brand and we estimate that it is about tied for the lead in the U.S. potato chip market," said a Procter & Gamble spokesman. "Our volume has shown recent growth." Industry experts estimate that, at best, Pringle's will sell $150 million—a very substantial volume—in 1976, not far behind the $225 million of the top-selling brand, Frito's.

Meanwhile, at the same time that traditional potato chip manufacturers have been berating P. & G. over the airwaves for churning out a fabricated product, they have been test marketing and researching their own brands of fabricated chips, just in case the market swings that way.

The whole potato chip project has been costly for P. & G. Its highly automated Tennessee plant is estimated to have cost about $70 million, and there is a second, smaller plant in North Carolina. But despite the fact that it seems to be losing right now, P. & G. has time and money on its side. For, most important of all, the artificial chip is cheaper to produce and distribute over the long run. "The cost factor will be extremely important over the next couple of years," says Ed Jones, vice president of Mitchell, Hutchins Inc., the Wall Street firm. "P. & G. can keep bringing in new versions of Pringle's with different tastes and keep cutting prices."

Moreover, P. & G. has obviously convinced a consortium of Euorpean food firms that prefabricated potato chips are the way to go for Common Market countries too. The first of the now familiar canister-packed chips called "Chipsletten" went on the market in German grocery stores last May.

"Those people who think Pringle's is washed up don't know P. & G. very well," says Hercules Segalas, analyst and senior vice president of Drexel Burnham Lambert, another big investment house. "It will take a lot more to get them to throw in the towel."

SCUDDER
SCUDDER STEVENS & CLARK INVESTMENT COUNSEL

The Holt Investment Advisory presents . . .

The Case Against Blue Chips

And advises how to protect and build capital now

The recent market break, in our opinion, represents but the start of a protracted decline. In the past year or so, speculators have poured billions of dollars into the market in anticipation of the "inevitable" election-year rally. With the economy faltering and the market failing to advance, many of those shares are finally being liquidated by disappointed holders. Because of the heavy margin debt now outstanding, the liquidation could snowball in the months ahead.

Even with a bear market in prospect, many investors instinctively believe that it is safe to hang on to their blue chips. These companies are, of course, financially stronger and more efficiently run than firms of lesser standing. Hence, they are better positioned to weather any coming economic storm.

Nevertheless, the shares of even the best corporations in the world can be overpriced. That's why a super stock like Xerox has actually suffered a net decline over the last 11 years. And most so-called blue chips, we believe, are decidedly overpriced at present.

Bear-Market Strategy

But a bear market is nothing to fear, as long as you don't "freeze" and ride it all the way down. Indeed, to many innovative investors, sharp market movements—down as well as up—represent unusual capital-building opportunities.

Moreover, even in a bear market, some selected stock groups and non-equity issues can often advance. Frequently, in fact, the more the general market declines, the more these contra-cyclical issues appreciate.

A prominent lawyer, whose ties to the Democratic party go back a long way, stressed that point—though not too convincingly—at a private meeting of leading business executives late last week.

"You can bet your life that Mr. Carter will be doing things," the lawyer said. "There will be a lot of energy in his Administration with new people, but there will be a lot of discussion, too, with Congress and others, before he acts on taxes and other matters."

Significantly perhaps, there were reports last week that Mr. Carter would meet with business and labor leaders next month and that he would propose an early summit meeting with leaders of other nations to discuss international affairs.

Irving S. Shapiro, head of the giant E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Company, asked last week what he was looking for in the new Administration, said, "I hope for a state of mind that recognizes that no Administration can be successful unless the economy of the United States is working well. There is a great need for industry and for the Government to work together to make the economy work that way. We wouldn't then be adversaries.

"The nation is becoming more centrist," he added. "People have had enough Government, enough handouts. They are not pressing for tax cuts, but they are pressing for quality in Government and quality in life."

Although he and several other leading businessmen and private economists recently said they were not enamoured of the tax cut proposal Mr. Carter has hinted he might make in January, there is broad sentiment for some action to increase jobs. Mr. Shapiro suggested a cooperative program between Government and business. And Democratic economists, such as Andrew F. Brimmer and Walter W. Heller, in interviews, also suggested high priority for a jobs program in the Carter Administration.

Mr. Brimmer, who had spent 11 years in high Government posts, winding up as a governor of the Federal Reserve Board before resigning for a teaching position at Harvard a few years ago, said there was need for a combination of policies to get the economy "out its sidewise movement." He left Harvard last spring and now operates his own economic-financial consulting business in Washington. As a highly regarded economist, and articulate spokesman for the black business community, Mr. Brimmer has been widely mentioned for a top position in the Carter hierarchy.

"I would oppose a tax cut," he said, "but I would want a temporary tax rebate—maybe $10 billion to $12 billion—to stimulate consumer spending, and it should be effective no later than mid-May. I don't want a tax cut because the Government should not give up that claim on revenues."

On the jobs question, Mr. Brimmer said he would urge the new President to "put a great deal of stress on subsidies to private industry to create new jobs," rather than concentrating solely on a Governmental public-service employment plan. "It costs about $8,500 a job in the public-service plan. I would be willing to give, say, $10,000 a job to the private sector to have it take these unemployed young people and put them on their payrolls."

Mr. Brimmer said he would like to see Congress commit between $2 billion and $3 billion for such a program and exempt that amount from the budget ceiling for fiscal 1977. He suggested allocating two-thirds of the total to private industry and one-third to the public sector for the new jobs needed.

Prof. Heller, of the University of Minnesota, suggested for the short term the use of a $12 billion shortfall in Government spending this year, plus a $15 billion tax rebate, as "a booster shot" for the lagging economy. "Then," he said, "we ought to provide another $1 billion or so in antirecession grants to local Governments, and get going on a job program. That will have to be developed in a very deliberate way.

"For the longer run, we should look into a possible add-on to the investment credit if businesses increase their investments," he said.

There may be differences in approach on such projects. But few, in business or in Government, would disagree with Mr. Brimmer when he remarked:

"What is most needed is to generate confidence and get the private sector of our economy expanding again."

pace of new-car sales proved a stock market last week as the Dow l average retreated 15.38 points to

G.M.'s stock slumped 3½ points for the week to finish at 67½. This was in sharp contrast to its recent strength when the shares sold above 75.

Gold and precious metal stocks, by contrast, enjoyed a boom as the price of bullion advanced in European markets, partly on the rationale that President-elect Carter would re-ignite inflation when he took office. ASA Ltd., finishing at 21⅞, was ahead more than 3 points for the week. In August, this gold-oriented issue traded as low as 12⅝.

Volume for the week came to 83.41 million shares, compared with the previous week's 80.21 million shares.

Bond prices trended lower, partly because of inflation fears and partly because of disappointment that the Federal Reserve Board has not eased its monetary policy.

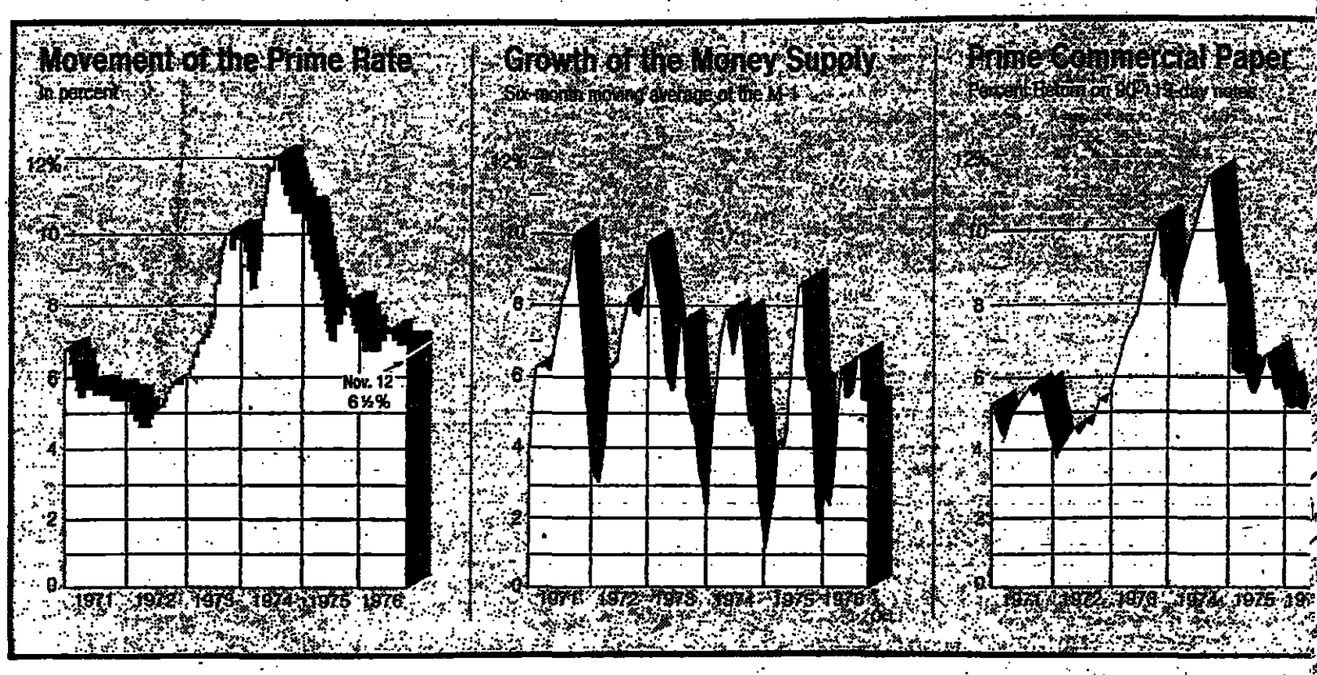
Inflation and Trusting in the Fed



By WILLIAM C. CATES

The weekly ritual of auguring the money supply has become monotonously predictable. Each Thursday at 4 P.M. the weekly money supply totals, designated as M-1 and M-2, are given out. They are either up or down. Diligent financial reporters quickly telephone senior vice presidents and chief economists of leading bond trading houses in search of quotable punditry for Friday's editions. On Friday the financial markets react. On Monday there is a commentary on the reaction.

Augury is neater and surer if it is based on the entrails of only one bird. For this reason it is M-1—the sum of cash and demand deposits—that gets the headlines. If M-1 is up, the senior vice presidents and chief economists pronounce darkly that M-1 is creeping towards the top of the Federal Reserve's "guidelines," and warn that the Fed will soon be obliged to cut back on monetary expansion.

This, they say, will force interest rates up. The bond market then slumps and short-term interest rates rise in shivering anticipation of a money squeeze. The stock market either rises or falls. If it falls, the fall is attributed to apprehension over M-1. If it rises, other reasons can always be found for shrugging off the M-1 jitters.

If M-1 is down, a sigh of relief passes through the financial community. For a falling M-1 means that the Fed will soon start to push it up again and, when that happens, interest rates will fall. The money markets perk up in anticipation of fresh federal funds. If the stock market happens to go down, the blame is laid on the index of leading indicators or the latest political commentary from Washington.

To this established ritual there is usually added a long-term forecast of equally predictable pattern. Capital spending will rise six months from the date of the forecast. This will produce a "credit squeeze." Interest rates will rise and the Fed will have to increase the money supply—and re-kindle inflation—in order to hold them down.

An alternative forecast, ominously emanating from the Wharton School, whose top economist advises President-elect Carter, is that already in the fourth quarter of this year the Fed will feel obliged to expand the money supply in order to revitalize a sagging economy. Thus, if things pick up, the Fed will have to increase the money supply to hold interest rates down, and if they don't pick up, the Fed will have to increase the money supply to make them pick up.

All this punditry is based on two premises, one broad and one narrow. The broad premise is that if more money is printed money will cost less. The narrow premise is that the immediate market effect of Fed purchases and sales of Treasury bills is also the ultimate or lasting effect. Both of these premises are empirically and logically outmoded.

As the accompanying chart shows, since 1971 high rates of increase in the money supply have coincided with rising interest rates, while lower rates of increase in M-1 have been almost immediately reflected in declining interest rates. The correlation is uncanny, particularly when we remember that the past five and a half years have witnessed extreme ups and downs in the credit demands of a business cycle.

What was cause and what was effect in this monetary wonderland? Was the Fed trying to promote prosperity by deliberately increasing the money supply? If so, interest rates went up, not down. Was the Fed trying to "stabilize" interest rates by buying Treasury bills? If so, it should have been selling them. Run fast to accommodate loan demand—and you fall behind. Stop—and you move ahead.

Stabilizing interest rates, a policy emphasis recently resurrected by some members of the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee, might be a good idea, but only after a thorough course in mirror-writing. Thus far the evidence is that Treasury Bill prices will ultimately rise if the Fed sells Treasury bills and fall if the Fed buys them.

Ours is not the only nation to discover that printing a lot of money creates high interest rates and, incidentally, stagnation. The bank rate in Britain is 15 percent, in West Germany 3.5 percent. What is the logic behind this looking glass? It is, of course, the logic of inflationary expectations.

In the good old days of the 1950's and early 60's, inflation was minimal and was attributed to labor unions or corporate price-fixers, depending on your political persuasion. Exchange rates were stable, and they were linked, at least psychologically, to gold. If devaluations occurred, it was among the British or the French, people with obviously very little discipline. In short, inflation was not regarded as a monetary phenomenon. We had confidence in our currency.

Today we have floating rates among paper currencies. The more paper printed for any given currency, the soggier it gets and the deeper it sinks. Borrowers and lenders have become acutely aware of this, with the result that an inflation premium has entered the interest rate structure.

Interest rates are determined by three factors: risk inherent in the borrower, loan demand and the inflation premium. Risk is approximately nil for government paper and most other short-term monetary instruments. Credit demand has historically produced rates up to a maximum of 7 percent long-term and 9 percent short-term in blow-out boom years.

More relevant to today's picture are the short-and long-term interest rates of the recovery years of 1961-62, which amounted to 4½ percent for 30-year triple-A bonds and 4 percent for commercial paper. Thus, between 4 and 5 percent, both short-and long-term, is probably the bedrock rate dictated by credit demand during a recovery period such as we have today. The rest is the fluff of inflation premium.

In today's environment any attempts to "stimulate" the economy by creating more money only serve to push up interest rates—as the inflation premium rushes in—to the chagrin of homebuyers and the demoralization of the financial markets. But, by the same token, the Fed can surely stimulate the economy if it continues successfully to dispell the fear of inflation and, with that fear, the inflation premium that persists in our interest-rates.

If the Fed is finally able [illegible] confidence in its management [illegible] currency, the impact on bond markets, and therefore [illegible] spending, will be electric. Bond Deal for the Sawback Turtle

By JOHN H. ALLAN

David E. Morine, a 33-year-old investment banker with a master's degree in business administration from the University of Virginia, recently completed an unusual $13 million deal. He made a tender offer for a Mississippi timber company once eyed covetously by the Masonite Corporation, took control and dissolved it.

He then sold 31,916 acres of Pascagoula River bottomland to the state, which raised the funds for the land by selling a bond issue to a Wall Street group led by the Chase Manhattan Bank. Mr. Morine took the money and paid off a bank loan that he had taken out to get the cash to make the tender offer in the first place. The loan had cost him $3,000 a day in interest.

But David Morine doesn't work on Wall Street, and his motive is not profit. He works out of Washington for the Nature Conservancy, an organization that traces its roots back to 1917 and that aims to protect natural areas from destruction. In the old days, that was largely a matter of accepting donations from the rich, but no more.

While Mr. Morine doesn't think of himself as an investment banker, his completion of the Pascagoula River land puts him in the same league as the business school graduates who structure deals of Morgan Stanley & Company, Goldman, Sachs & Company and other leading Wall Street houses.

The obvious difference, of course, is at the bottom line. Investment bankers' fees are rarely less than handsome, but Mr. Morine' goal was to save the only known home of the yellow-splotched sawback turtle, the habitat of the swallow-tailed kite and the Southern panther—a 50-square-mile preserve that is regarded as the single most important natural area in Mississippi.

It took three years to bring off the deal. In the fall of 1973 Graham Wisner, a law student and descendant of a family that had built up a large lumber business in the South in the 1800's, dropped in at the Washington headquarters of the Conservancy and told the staff that he was part-owner of the Pascagoula Hardwood Company, a land-rich, cash-poor concern faced with financial problems.

Pascagoula Hardwood had about 100 shareholders, chiefly among four families who lived in Laurel, Miss., but the company had not really worked its timberland for years and it had little or no earnings. The lumber company owned 42,000 acres, including more than 30 miles along the Pascagoula River, some 40 picturesque lakes, two clear water streams — property that Masonite had attempted to acquire through what it hoped would be a tax-free exchange of stock.

A placid scene in the Pascagoula River bottomlands.

An adverse Government ruling kept Masonite from getting the land, and it also left some of the stockholders with estate tax problems because the stock — considered worthless in the Depression — clearly now had value.

While some of the stockholders wanted to make Pascagoula Hardwood more profitable by leasing its lands to timber cutters more actively, Graham Wisner and others, wanted to preserve at least part of the tract.

The Conservancy studied the situation, but it quickly became pessimistic. The land, it estimated, was worth $22 million, and the Conservancy had only four members in all of Mississippi. The stockholders wanted a tax-free exchange of stock, which the Conservancy couldn't provide them, and they were in no position to make an outright donation.

In 1974, however, Mr. Morine met Avery Wood, the newly appointed head of the Mississippi Game and Fish Department. Mr. Wood was worried because Mississippi owned so few gamelands outright, while it leased 1.5 million acres for recreational useage on a year-to-year basis from timber companies. He calculated that the state ought to acquire at least 175,000 acres of wildlife habitat by 1980 if Mississippians were to continue to enjoy hunting and fishing just as they always had.

Mr. Morine and Mr. Wood lobbied successfully for the creation of a Mississippi Wildlife Heritage Committee in the State Legislature, and the new group endorsed the state's a[illegible] of Pascagoula Hardwood's lan[illegible]

BUSINESS ROUNDUP

Hanging Around in the Chairman's Office

James J. Needham won't be going ack to the boardroom of the New ork Stock Exchange—he'll be hanging ound in the waiting room of William . Batten's office.

Mr. Needham, who resigned last May exchange chairman, has just joined e of the world's most exclusive art llections—the 38 portraits of past airmen and presidents of the Big ard that grace the walls of the sixth-or executive offices at 11 Wall reet.

Mr. Needham maintains tradition th his head-to-waist portrait done ostly in somber hues by C. J. Fox. e portrait will hang on a wall in airman Batten's office as soon as a rent redecoration project is com-ted. By tradition, portraits of the st recent chief executives are dis-yed in or near the chairman's office. The boardroom houses a permanent llection, chosen by a committee in 54, of portraits that date from the mid-19th century to 1921. The remaining portraits are rotated around various committee rooms.

Also by custom, the retiring chairman picks his own artist, with the Big Board footing the bill. James E. Buck, secretary of the exchange, was reluctant to discuss the cost of the tradition, noting that it is not an uncommon practice for major corporations to commission portraits of outgoing presidents or chairmen. Estimates on the price of a portrait vary from $500 to $2,500 and the difficulty in guessing prices, as one artist put it, is that "you can get a good portrait for $500 and a rotten one for $5,000."

"I've sort of assumed the position of curator," says Mr. Buck. The Exchange also displays the portraits of three "outsiders"—Washington, Jefferson and Hamilton—and the boardroom boasts a number of curios. The podium from the early 19th century when the N.Y.S.E. was a "call market" (stocks were called out and traded in alphabetical order) is there, and so are the light fixtures from the original trading floor. James Watson Cunningham's "seat," a straight-backed armchair that also dates from the call market era, is preserved in a committee room.

According to Mr. Buck, the Big Board's collection has never been appraised and there are no immediate plans to do so. Nor are there any plans for a public exhibition.

Some of the past chairmen from the exchange's earliest days are not represented. The tradition was also interrupted in the 1930's and 1940's, notes Richard H. Lundholm, an assistant to Mr. Buck, "perhaps because there wasn't enough money on the Street to warrant continuing." When things got better in the 1950's, the Exchange commissioned the portraits of those who had been skipped.

ear It, Sew It, Stuff It, Wear It

The rising popularity of skiing, oping and backpacking has brought sperity to some of the companies t cater to the sew-at-home crowd. -it-yourself kits for down-filled kas, vests, bib overalls, comforters sleeping bags represent a business t has grown rapidly and now ounts to perhaps $20 million a year.

Frostline Kits Inc., the oldest and gest of the companies, sells its Cres-e jacket kit (right) for $26.95 and optional belt kit for $1.95. "Gener-, we're 30 percent to 50 percent be-the retail price of an article," says Williams, a spokesman for Frost-, "and almost all of the discount es from labor-cost savings." The ther and Down Association Inc., in York says other kit companies r an equivalent discount.

Betty Ford, Nominee

The nominations from the floor included Betty Ford and Rosalynn Carter. No, it wasn't a rerun of the Presidential race. In fact, it had little, if anything to do with politics.

The event was Norton Simon Inc.'s annual meeting, held last week at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel. The first order of business was the election of directors. Now, such an election is usually a cut-and-dried matter, with management's slate winning by a wide margin (albeit sometimes accompanied by vociferous protests). But this time, things were complicated by the sudden death a few days before the meeting of Gustave L. Levy, the investment banker, who had been on the slate.

Up stepped Wilma Soss, a corporate critic and stockholder, who nominated Betty Ford for a seat on the now not-to-be-quite-filled board.

And why not? Mrs. Soss has always been an advocate of women's presence in the boardrooms and Norton Simon has only one woman director—Stella Russell, a retired vice president of the company. Besides Mrs. Ford is a customer of Halston, the fashion designer whose business belongs to N.S.I., and she sews (N.S.I. owns the McCall Pattern Company).

David J. Mahoney, chairman, president and chief executive officer of N.S.I. thought the nomination a good enough idea to second it. In a rare display of corporate-and-critic cooperation, he promised to ask Mrs. Ford if she were interested in accepting a seat.

Whereupon John Gilbert, another corporate gadfly who was apparently not to be outdone, put the name of Rosalynn Carter in the ring. At that point, other nominations started coming from the floor and no one got around to seconding Mrs. Carter, or anyone else.

Meanwhile, stockholders who consulted the proxy statement for the meeting might have noted that the 53-year-old Mr. Mahoney is one of corporate America's very best paid executives. Last year he received $400,000 in salary plus $444,444 (or 111.111 percent of base pay) as a bonus payment. (By contrast Harold S. Geneen, chairman of the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, got just $776,085 last year.)

But there is still, apparently, room for improvement. Mr. Simon's contract specifies that he can draw between 75 percent and 125 percent of salary as bonus, depending on how the company does in relation to certain predesignated goals. So if everything had gone perfectly, he could presumably have gotten a $500,000 bonus.

Whatever the on, convenience stores, those open-y, open-late, mini supermarkets like even, Shop 'n Go and Cumberland ns—have practically become a necessity of life for many people.

In fact, their sales in 1976 are expected to pass the $7 billion mark for the first time ever, according to Convenience Store News, a leading industry publication. The number of stores in operation will also have reached a record — 30,000 outlets.

"This industry is thriving, despite the fact that many supermarket chains are beginning to stay open for seven days and for longer hours," said Harry N. Traugott, the publication's publisher. "Customers prefer shopping in the friendly and small outlet."

Most convenience store customers are men. They spend about three minutes in a store, buying three items for an average sale of $1.38, according to Mr. Traugott.

While most of the items cost more than they would in a supermarket, this apparently hasn't discouraged customers. Twenty years ago, there were less than 500 convenience stores and sales totalled $75 million. Last year, it was 27,905 stores, selling $6.4 billion.

WASHINGTON REPORT

Who Should Develop Solar Energy?

By EDWARD COWAN

WASHINGTON—Who shall control r energy?

e question is raised in two recent rs—one to the Exxon Corporation Representative Richard L. Ottin-and Senator Gary Hart, and one to ral Energy Administrator Frank G. b from the Center for Science in the lic Interest, a nonprofit group based he co-ordinators of the center's en-y project, Ken Bossong and Alan gaki, express concern about the en-y agency's interest in integrating r-electric power into private utility ribution systems. "Utilities could ltiy monopolize the solar energy d and drive small solar industries of business," they say, adding that y would prefer an approach similar he Tennessee Valley Authority "util-g municipal governments and public ity systems to commercialize" elec-ity from sunshine.

Mr. Bossong and Mr. Okagaki ac-wledge that big companies can con-"positive benefits" on a fledgling nology because they can pour a of money into it. But on balance y doubt that the public interest uld be served.

imilarly, the two liberal Democrats, Ottinger of New York and Mr. Hart Colorado, question whether Exxon's erest in solar energy is benign.

Exxon intends for solar energy to kept under wraps until fossil fuel rkets are exhausted," they wrote to C. Kauffmann, the company presi-t.

The Ottinger-Hart letter should be d as an early round in a coming legislative battle. Senator Hart voted last year for a bill to keep oil companies out of other energy lines. Such a bill will come up again, and may have a better chance—but not necessarily a better-than-even-chance—of passing than the bill to break up 18 big oil companies into producing, pipeline and refining units.

The two letters are noteworthy not only for the issues they raise but for the suspicion of corporations they express.

"Vesting control of solar-electric power generation in private utilities would tend to result in monopolization of distribution with attendant problems of excessive profit-taking and unchecked favoritism in equipment purchases," contend Mr. Bossong and Mr. Okagaki. Who favored vendors would be, they don't say, but the implication is that they would be big companies, not small.

The Ottinger-Hart letter accuses Exxon of having "misinformed the public" about solar energy with a magazine advertisement "riddled with inaccurate statistics"—excessive cost estimates "and pessimistic projections." Exxon defended the cost figures in a reply to Mr. Ottinger and Mr. Hart.

But Exxon did concede that its Congressional critics were on firm ground on one point—that the company's ads should stress solar's life-cycle costs—meaning averaging the high purchase prices with low operating costs attributable to fuel savings—rather than just initial costs. "We will keep this in mind for any such future ads," Mr. Kauffmann promised.

That could give solar a boost. Both Mr. Kauffmann and his critics seem to agree on at least one point—that consumers have shied from the more expensive solar appliance models because they cost more. Indeed, Congress in 1975 mandated energy-efficiency labeling to teach the public about life-cycle costs.

The high-cost question, advocates of solar energy have suggested, has produced a chicken-and-egg problem: the public isn't buying solar space-heating and hot-water equipment in great volume because prices are too high—prices won't come down until economies of mass production (mass sales) are realized.

Both letters inadvertently raise the question of whether any company in the energy field can make a cautious, unglowing assessment of the economic prospects for solar energy without being accused of bad faith?

'Many conservation groups are willing to let consumers pay unreasonable prices for solar energy...'

To illustrate what they call the utilities' "uncertain" commitment to solar energy, Mr. Bossong and Mr. Okagaki quote a utility executive as saying: "Solar won't be commercially competitive until the early part of the next century. So, in my lifetime, I don't envision solar having a marked effect on our generating capacity."

Similarly, the Ottinger-Hart letter faults Exxon for having said that sunshine may become a major source of energy only in the next century.

The Bossong-Okagaki letter was written to object to the participation of 11 electric utilities (10 private, one public) in a $500,000 Federal Energy Administration contract to examine how to bring solar-electric power into utilities' grids in eight Southwestern states.

According to William G. Rosenberg, an F.E.A. assistant administrator, the letter writers' desire to keep solar power separate would mean higher costs to consumer and slower development. He contended that solar electric power would be more costly than conventional power and that only if its costs were averaged in could it be economic.

"Many conservation groups are quite willing to let consumers pay unreasonable prices for solar energy," Mr. Rosenberg said. "They want solar to move, even if it's more expensive."

He suggested there was a confusion in the letter. The small companies in the solar energy field make heating and cooling equipment, not solar-electric equipment, he said, and therefore the utilities would be unlikely to put them out of business.

CAREER SERVICES

For Executives Seeking New Positions From $20,000 To $200,000

A Faster Way To Change Jobs!

If you are planning on advancing yourself in today's competitive job market, then you may be interested in our Executive Marketing Service.

I am speaking of a Professional Service,—one we've developed to make job changing an easier, faster and far more effective experience.

As authors and publishers of "The Professional Job Changing System," we have already helped over 250,000 Managers, Professionals and Executives.

Our ideas have drawn the praise of Business Week, Nation's Business, Personnel Magazine and many others.

As part of our Executive Marketing Service, we take care of all job hunting details for our clients, ...enabling them to move with a speed and convenience which otherwise could not be attained.

People Who Have Used Our Service

Our service has been used successfully by people seeking opportunities at virtually all salary levels.

Over the years we have been retained by many well-known individuals, such as ex-congressmen, corporate presidents, and former generals.

However, we have also helped men and women at all levels of management, including salesmen, purchasing agents, CPA's, scientists, stockbrokers, engineers, EDP specialists, plant managers and many others.

Most of our clients retain us so that they can achieve significant financial advancement. Others are motivated by a desire to relocate, or to change industries or careers.

Still others use our service because they are blocked out or are unemployed, or simply because they need to obtain a job offering more personal enjoyment.

Some recent accomplishments of our clients have included the following.

- A General Manager of a Tool and Die Company in New England. . .earning $55,000, won a new position as President of a subsidiary of a blue-chip Pittsburgh firm at $75,000.
- A Dallas Stockbroker whose earnings had fallen during the recession to $13,000, took a job as salesman with a New Hampshire Graphic Arts firm at $24,500.
- A 36 year-old CPA with a construction firm, landed a new position in the geographical area of his preference, while moving his base salary from $26,000 to $33,000.
- A young MBA, out of school 4 years, . . .was able to generate 8 job offers,. . . one of which offered 50% higher earnings and a chance to be General Manager of a chain of cinemas.
- A 56 year old Research Scientist, unemployed, after losing a $33,000 job with a defense company. . .in 8 weeks began new employment with a non-defense firm as Director of R & D at $45,000.
- An Assistant Plant Manager, blocked from further growth at $15,000, landed a $22,000 Plant Manager position with a large soft drink company.
- A $55,000 V.P. Engineering won a top general management position in London, and a total compensation package in six figures.
- A successful office products Salesman, seeking a major increase in responsibility, . . .won a new job as Marketing Director with a consumer products firm in Phoenix, Arizona.
- A President of an American Stock Exchange firm, who had been ousted, was able to become Chief Executive of another listed corporation, while maintaining his $100,000 plus earnings level.
- A Personnel Director, employed for 20 years with one company, was successful in joining a New Jersey consulting firm in a general management capacity at 45% higher earnings.
- An Engineer whose earnings had stabilized at $31,000, was able to get a new job as Director of Technical Services with a Chicago Photographic company at $38,500.
- A Data Processing Executive who lost his job through a merger, was successful in developing 7 attractive offers in less than 10 weeks' time.
- A Controller in a division of a large firm, became Executive V.P. and General Manager of a small public corporation.
- A Sales Executive, with 18 years in one product area, was able to shift industries while increasing his total earnings by over 40%.

All of our work is customized, and tailored to each client's personal needs. A great advantage of our activity is in the significant convenience and competitive advantage that we provide.

Most important, however, is our capacity for "packaging" people, and for moving them into interviewing on an accelerated basis. Our methods for doing this make sure that our clients market themselves to the maximum of their personal potential.

If you would like to learn more about our Executive Marketing Service, you may call John Reynolds of our New York Staff for an appointment (212-686-7633), or in New Jersey, call Ronald Colvin at (201-226-6477). There is no cost or obligation, and naturally, confidences are respected. We would be glad to review your situation, and to relate our capabilities to your personal needs.

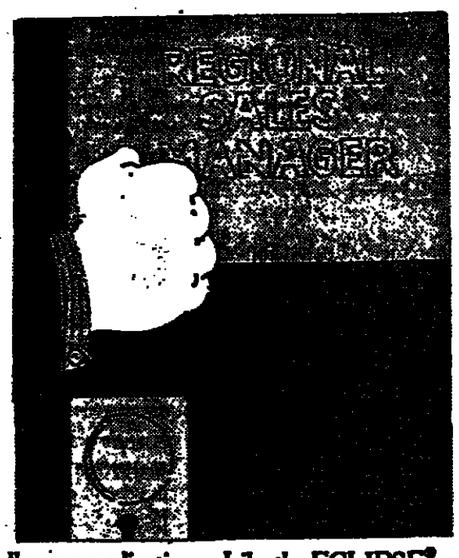
How to break the news to your boss that you're becoming a sales engineer at Data General.



Very gently.

Lately, he's probably heard the same news from other top sales engineers on his team. And he'll probably be a little annoyed with you.

But tell him the reasons. Straight.

Tell him you're going to make more money.

Then tell him you're going to work for a computer company where total sales have grown from $1 million to $160 million in just over 8 years. Profitably.

Tell him that Data General is in aggressive pursuit of new markets for its computers. And tell him we have the products to handle new applications. Like the ECLIPSE® C/330 with IDEA (interactive data entry access) software, the NOVA®3/D and our microNOVA.

But the most important thing to tell him and all your friends is that Data General is looking for other successful sales engineers. Then give them our phone number.

PROFESSIONAL COMPUTER SALESPEOPLE: THINK ABOUT UPGRADING YOUR POTENTIAL AND MAKE A MOVE.

TO AMDAHL:

BUILDER OF THE WORLD'S MOST EXCITING COMPUTER

Six years ago, a small group of leading designers of large computers—under the direction of a preeminent, pioneering computer scientist—set out to design and build a new generation of large computers.

Today, the Amdahl 470V/6 system is just that: a top-of-the-line, 3.8 to 5.2 million dollar computer that performs more work at lower cost than any other general purpose computer. It's unprecedented, and so is the company.

Within the past 18 months, this exceptional comany has delivered 21 of these systems. Over $88,000,000 worth. But more to the point: 8 of the 21 were shipped during the third quarter of this year. Which is why we need help . . . from exceptional, enthusiastic individuals who need to perform well because the task is worth it, and because it's fun. We made a commitment to that philosophy when we began, and we're sticking to it. We have intentionally created a friendly environment where personal efforts are recognized, and we are keeping that way, despite our rapid growth.

Linda Catenacci would like to hear from you at Amdahl Corporation, 680 Fifth Ave., New York 10019. We are, of course, an equal opportunity employer.

MARKETING OPPORTUNITY AT AMDAHL

PROFESSIONAL LARGE SCALE COMPUTER SYSTEMS SALESPEOPLE

You are the right candidate for this opportunity if you do not have to make a move: if you are currently leading your peers in competence, enthusiasm and performance, and if you have a need to be on a winning team selling the better product. You will have a thorough knowledge of the large-scale computer marketplace, and a five-year performance record. You will enjoy the personal and professional satisfaction of selling the proven price-performance leader, and enthusiastically relating the Amdahl success story to a wide audience that is anxious to hear the details. In addition, you will enjoy an extremely attractive income, incentive and benefits package. Immediate openings exist in our Eastern Division, headquartered in New York City.

ior officials of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency in the Blue House, the executive compound in Seoul. What was discussed at that meeting is apparently known to American investigators but has not been made public. It is known that soon thereafter Mr. Park was working with a list of Congressmen whose influence was important to creating a favorable climate for South Korea on Capitol Hill. The list came to 90 names.

Seoul's illegal activities apparently came to the attention of the United States Government when they began. Former Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird said last week that he had warned the State Department about it in 1970, and suggested a Justice Department inquiry be requested. A current Federal inquiry is said to be working with American intelligence reports on the seminal Blue House meeting, among other evidence.

Why a formal inquiry did not begin until 1973, or an active investgation get under way until 1975, is not clear. In 1975, however, a number of previously unrelated strands converged.

Mr. Park's gift of a vacation to a member of the White House staff led to a White House inquiry that led to Mr. Park. A Korean diplomat who had taken political asylum in the United States testified in Congressional hearings on human rights violations and, in an aside, referred to the Korean lobby and Korean intelligence participation in it. An American Foreign Service officer who had once been United States Ambassador to Seoul suggested investigation of Mr. Park's trade connections.

Whether any of the Congressmen on the list were actually influenced or bribed has not yet been determined; that question is currently the main subject of two Justice Department inquiries. Four current or former Congressmen have said they or members of their families have received money, though describing it as gifts or campaign contributions; two others are under investigation for bribery charges, and it is known that records of six more are under investigation. Under American law, it is illegal for public officials to take bribes; campaign contributions from foreign sources were made i gal in 1975.

The ..,000 American soldiers were withdrawn in 1971, but plans for further troop reductions, announced then, have not been implemented; 40,000 troops remain. The $1.5 billion modernization program was passed.

A Secret Meeting On Life or Death

The United States and 14 other major exporters of nuclear fuel and technology have met secretly in London to discuss one of the most perplexing and immediately threatening matters in international relations: How to supply the world's energy needs without giving still more nations the ability to make, and therefore use, atomic weapons.

The conferees included nations from both East and West. Whether they made progress on a problem equally urgent for all nations is not known.

According to the International Institute for Strategic Studies, 469 nuclear reactors are in operation or under construction in 58 countries. The problem, however, is not the reactors themselves, but the nuclear energy cycle's waste products, which can be reprocessed to produce such bomb-making materials as plutonium.

Reprocessing plants exist now in the United States, France, Britain and the Soviet Union—four of the five acknowledged nuclear weapons powers. (China, the fifth, is not a member of the group that met in London.) But the French have agreed to build such a plant in Pakistan, although reports last week indicated they may be reconsidering on the deal, and West Germany has contracted with Brazil to supply a facility for producing material from which bombs can be made.

The deals, both opposed by the United States, lent urgency to last week's meeting of the Nuclear Suppliers Conference. The body was founded two years ago after India used materials and know-how supplied by Canada for peaceful purposes to build and detonate a small atomic bomb.

There is growing awareness that tougher safeguards, perhaps a full ban on the sale of reprocessing plants, may be necessary, but whether such a step is possible is questionable. Billions of dollars are involved.

The urgency of the matter is not in question. It has been estimated that seven nations can now make the bomb, and there are unconfirmed reports that Israel and South Africa can. Other nations that are seeking actively to join the "nuclear club," in addition to Pakistan, are South Korea, Taiwan and Libya.

If Diplomacy Fails, Few Nations Eschew Underhanded Methods

Influence Peddling, a Global Industry

By RICHARD HALLORAN

"He errs least and will be most favored by fortune who suits his proceedings to the times and always follows the impulses of his nature."
—NICCOLO MACHIAVELLI, "The Discourses"

WASHINGTON—The time was the spring of 1970. The Nixon Administration had shocked the South Koreans, allies by treaty and by troops fighting alongside Americans in Vietnam, by informing Seoul that 20,000 of the 64,000 American soldiers posted in Korea would be withdrawn the following year. The Koreans feared the American commitment to their defense had begun to crumble.

President Park Chung Hee's Government suited its proceedings to the turbulent times and followed the impulses of its nature, which was to extend to Washington the heavy-handed and corrupt practices that are everyday affairs in Korean politics.

In so doing, the South Koreans plunged into a gray area that lies beyond normal diplomacy and short of armed force in their effort to influence the United States Government. It is an area that was already crowded: Not only in Washington, but all over the world, government and their agents are trying to influence each other's official actions, either for policy purposes, or for making money.

The Israelis, the Nationalist Chinese, the British, the Japanese, and nearly every other nation have had lobbies in Washington in one form or another for years. Their efforts, moreover, have been augmented by organizations dedicated to trade promotion or cultural exchange. But none, so far as is known, has relied so heavily on its intelligence service, on sub rosa methods or spent as much money as have the South Koreans.

The United States is no stranger to charges of subversive action. The Central Intelligence Agency has been trying, sometimes quite successfully, to manipulate other governments for nearly thirty years. The agency is said to have helped elect Ramon Magsaysay to be president of the Philippines in 1953 and to have toppled President Ngo Dinh Diem in South Vietnam in 1963. American intelligence agents are alleged to have had a hand in ousting President Salvador Allende Gossens of Chile in 1973. For a quarter of a century, the agency has reportedly helped to finance anti-Communist political parties in Western Europe. It has been said, for example, to have made large contributions to defeat the Italian Communists in the 1972 election in that country.

American business has not been above trying to influence government decisions abroad with underhanded means. Since early this year, revelations of alleged Lockheed Aircraft Corporation bribery has rocked governments in Japan, the Netherlands, Italy and Turkey. Honeywell Inc., the Boeing Company, Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co., International Telephone and Telegraph, Westinghouse Electric Corporation and General Tire and Rubber were on a growing list of American corporations who have recently acknowledged making questionable payments to foreign officials. In many cases, American businssmen have contended they were forced to kick in by demand from foreign government officials. In South Korea, for instance, the Gulf Oil Corporation has said it was asked for $4 million in political contributions it gave.

As for the rest of the world, executives of Japanese trading companies have often been accused of trying to influence Governmental decisions, especially in Southeast Asia, with bribes. Nationalist Chinese lobbies in Tokyo have tried to sway Japanese conservatives, as Communist Chinese agents have played upon the sentiments of Japanese Leftists. European businessmen are said to have crossed the palms of Arab politicians, the Russians have sought favor among the emerging African nations. And all over the world, arms merchants—generally viewed, and on occasion acting, as surrogates of their national establishments—are believed, guilty or not, to employ bribes and kickbacks routinely.

But the target in most other nations differs from the target in America. In other countries, the givers of bribes and gifts look for favors from political leaders, bureaucrats in positions to make decisions, businessmen with connections in the bureaucratic and political worlds, anyone except a legislator. To mount a lobbying operation such as that of the South Koreans aimed at Parliament in London, the National Assembly in Paris or the Diet in Tokyo would have been to miss the mark.

The United States Congress seems to attract activity in the gray area, not because American Congressmen are any more or less venal than other legislators but because the doctrine of the separation of powers gives them more authority than others. Foreign lobbyists, to be sure, direct a good bit of attention to the bureaucracy and to senior officials in the executive branch of government here. But because the Congress has the power of the purse in the United States, it has been a prime target for lobbyists, whether properly identified and legally operating or, as in the case of the South Koreans, hidden and subversive.

There is another word from Niccolò Machiavelli that could well be heeded. The Italian statesman and political philosopher wrote elsewhere in "The Discourses" over 450 years ago: "We should notice how easily men are corrupted and become wicked, although originally good and well-educated."

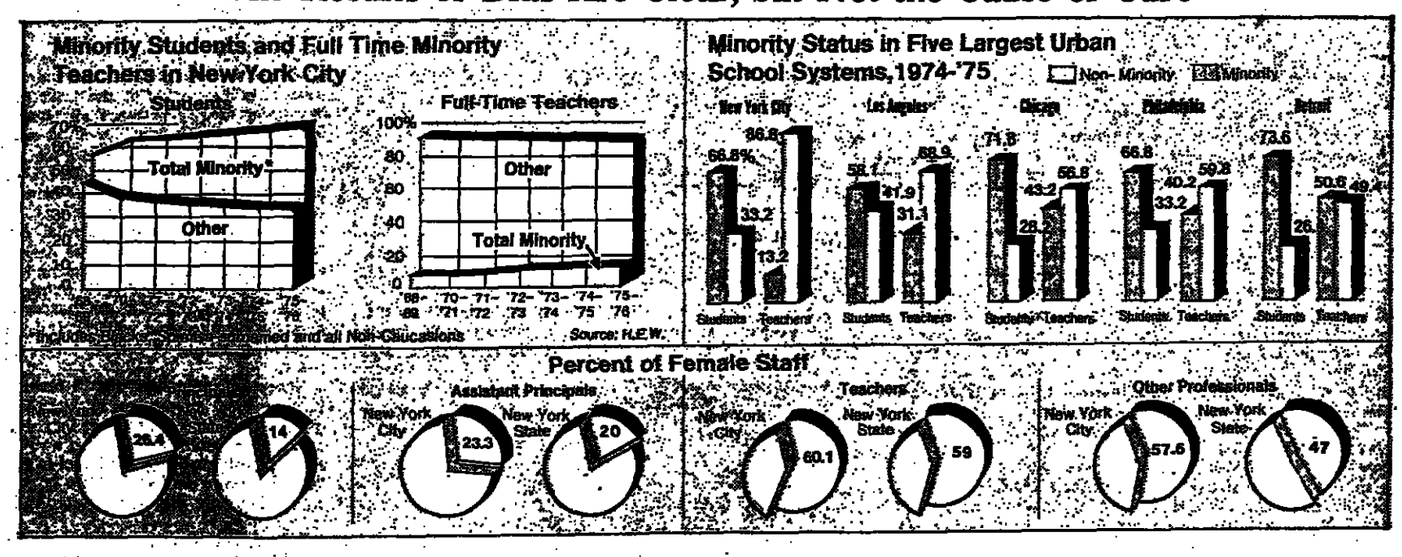
The Results of Bias Are Clear, but Not the Cause or Cure



New York City Reflected in Its Schools

After long study, the Federal Government has issued a report criticizing widespread discrimination in the New York City school system's hiring, assignment and promotion of minorities and women. The report confirmed what many believed, but it was limited in prescribing what can be done, and who can do it, within the conditions created by Government itself and by the seminal discrimination in the wider society.

Perhaps the most telling evidence in the report, prepared by the Office of Civil Rights in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, seemed to show that despite conditions over which no school boards have control, other large cities had done considerably better than New York. The city's ratio of minority-group teachers to minority students was the lowest of all major cities.

Testing and teacher ratio. Proportionally more whites pass and more minority group applicants fail or score poorly on the Board of Examiners test given all those seeking teaching jobs in New York City schools. The Federal report considers the test discriminatory apparently on the basis of the results it produces, since officials say they have no evidence to offer showing cultural bias in the test itself. The report suggests the city use instead a test given in other cities, the National Teacher Exam.

The school board uses not only the score but the test date to assign teachers; waiting lists are long and therefore minority group members, only recently in the job market in large numbers, have difficulty getting teaching jobs.

Placement and Segregation. To bypass the test route, many of these teachers put their names in an alternative "pool" where they may then be selected by independent local school boards for jobs in specified schools with a high level of poor readers, who in turn tend to be minority-group students. One result is that, although a larger percentage of blacks teach, most of them remain in predominantly black schools.

Promotion, Sex: More than half the city's teachers are women, but only one of four supervisory positions are held by women. Even fewer females are now being named supervisors than was the case a few years ago.

Who or what is to blame for the variety of discriminatory situations? The segregated housing pattern of the city clearly sets the limits or, at the least, creates enormous barriers to what the schools themselves can accomplish. Middle-class, generally white suburbs ring the city, the urban minority population grows and the job market tightens for whites and blacks alike.

Within the school-government system, unintentioned and well-intentioned actions have made a bad situation worse. For example, the Board of Examiners test is required by a once-progressive state law that, over the last 25 years, has had exclusionary effects.

A similar test for school supervisors was found illegal by a Federal judge in 1971; the teacher's test is also under legal challenge.

Another example is the pool system, which began with the 1969 Decentralization Law. Civil rights groups supported the pool as a way of bypassing the central board's authority. As one result, local school boards in Harlem can select from the pool black male teachers as "role models" for its students. The overall effect appears to be reinforced segregation in teaching staffs, although the local boards deny they have appointed enough teachers to make much difference.

The Board of Education and Chancellor Irving Anker have hardly been unaware of the discrimination in the system. Last year they sought state legislation that would have had the effect of increasing the percentage of minority-group teachers and diminishing the segregation created by the "pool" arrangement.

The legislation failed to pass. It was opposed by the United Federation of Teachers, one of the strongest lobbies in the state.

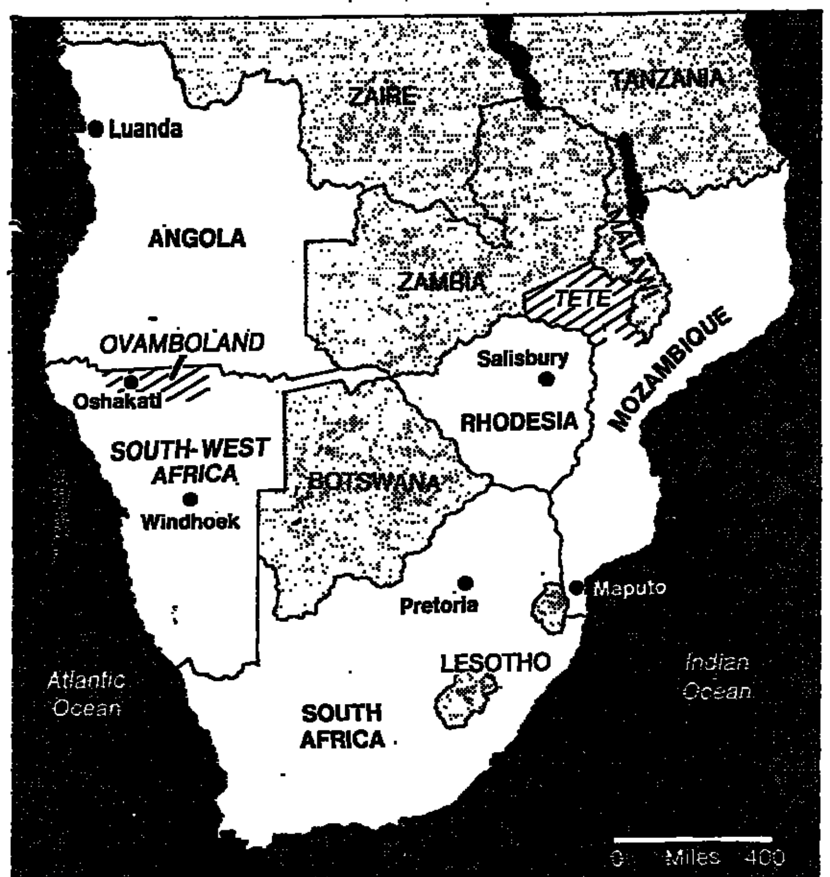
In Summary



Cross-hatching shows where (1) refugees fled into South-West Africa at Oshakati, and (2) Rhodesian forces conducted raids in Mozambique.

Africa: Threat Of All-Out War Is Still Real

The critical question facing southern Africans all along has been whether the transfer of power to the area's black majority will be accomplished through diplomacy or war. Events last week—a continued stalemate at the Geneva talks on Rhodesia and new fighting in Angola reportedly drawing in guerrillas from neighboring South-West Africa—appeared to shift the momentum in the direction of a widening racial conflict.

Although black and white delegates still expressed commitment to negotiations by their presence in Geneva, both sides say that the conflict in Rhodesia will intensify if the conference folds.

White Rhodesians, who last week marked their 12th anniversary of rebel independence from Britain, were buoyed by the success of recent raids on guerrilla bases in Mozambique and by South African Prime Minister John Vorster's pledge not to close the borders with Rhodesia to trade and, presumably, military supplies.

On the nationalist side, a meeting of the five so-called front-line African countries supporting majority rule in Rhodesia advocated war as the only way to bring that about. Behind the rhetoric was a shift in influence from the moderates among the five to President Samora Machel of Mozambique, who has aided Rhodesian guerrillas.

Also backing the militant statement was the Angolan President, Agostinho Neto, whose country, like Rhodesia, celebrated a birthday last week—the first anniversary of independence from Portugal. But in Angola there was an outbreak of fighting between government troops and remnants of the Union for the Total Independence of Angola, one of two Western-supported factions defeated by the Cuban and Soviet-backed Angolan forces early this year.

The fighting itself was not surprising. Pockets of resistance have persisted despite sporadic government efforts to clean out rebel hideouts. But, for the first time, there were reports that guerrillas of the South-West Africa People's Organization were aiding Angolan Government troops. The reports came from Angolan refugees, more than 3,000 of whom fled across the border into South-West Africa last week. South Africans voiced concern that in return for the guerrilla support, the Angolan Government would send men and weapons to aid the nationalists in South-West Africa. The territory, which the nationalists call Namibia, is ruled by Pretoria under a mandate declared illegal by the United Nations.

Multiracial talks on independence for the territory have been going on under South African auspices. But the guerrillas have not been allowed representation and have declared the conference illegitimate. The talks resumed last week for what many delegates termed a make-or-break effort to reach agreement on an interim government. If the effort fails, the guerrillas can be expected to stake a stronger claim to represent South-West Africa's black majority.

Labor's Losses In Parliament

British Prime Minister James Callaghan, already in serious difficulty as he tries to stabilize the country's economy, has encountered setbacks in Parliament that threaten his Government.

The Labor Party Government narrowly survived three votes in Parliament and lost one last week as it sought to speed passage of legislation sponsored by the regime's left wing and trade union leaders. Mr. Callaghan must rely on them if his economic strategy is to succeed.

Because the votes in the House of Commons were on amendments made in the legislation by the House of Lords, last week's actions also could lead to a constitutional debate over the power of the Conservative-dominated upper chamber to revise or delay legislation.

The defeat in the Commons, on a bill to give dock workers monopoly rights to handle cargo within five miles of all ports, was not regarded as a vote of nonconfidence, so Mr. Callaghan did not have to resign. But because the Labor Party is now outnumbered 323-312 by the combined Opposition, has suffered by-election losses and faces the possibility of more next year, Mr. Callaghan could yet be forced into a confidence vote. If he lost, a general election would follow, and most analysts now believe it would be won by Margaret Thatcher and the Conservative Party.

The Important Vote in Quebec

The voters of Quebec, Canada's second most populous province, tomorrow will elect a new government and may also decide, indirectly, whether the largely French-speaking region will remain part of Canada or become independent.

The Federal Liberal Party Government of Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau has tried to foster national bilingualism to counter the belief of many French-Canadians that they are second-class citizens in their own country. But that effort, because of a feeling that French-Canadians are now getting too favorable treatment, has provoked a backlash against Mr. Trudeau in Western Canada, where there are few French. The antipathy of the West has been increased by the actions of the Quebec Prime Minister, Robert Bourassa, and the Liberal provincial Government he heads.

The Federal Liberals are constrained by national considerations, but the provincial party has to counter the appeal of Rene Levesque's Parti Québécois, which favors independence.

In July, 1974, Mr. Bourassa's regime passed an Official Language Act, better known as Law 22, which declares French as Quebec's official language for governmental and business dealings, with English given a lesser role in the schools. This has drawn the wrath of many people, particularly that of Southern European immigrants in the Montreal area who want their children taught in English, the only language they feel fits them for careers in North America.

Mr. Bourassa's Government has also been beset by charges of corruption and criticism of its handling of the economy. As a result, according to the latest polls, the Parti Québécois is expected to gain ground and the present cushion of 97 Liberals to 6 for the Parti Québécois and 7 others in the provincial legislature may not be enough to keep Mr. Bourassa in power.

A U.S. Vote Against Israel

The United States broke with its past practice last week and joined with other nations in the United Nations Security Council in a formal statement critical of Israel but not of the Arab nations.

The statement—which is an expression of opinion only and is not subject to veto—dealt with Israeli policy in the occupied Arab territories, a subject on which Washington has usually either supported Israel or, if it could not, avoided participation entirely.

There were apparently several reasons for the departure.

First, the Americans said (and Israeli diplomats did not disagree) that United States negotiators had been able to narrow the statement so that (1) it deplored the establishment of Jewish settlements in the occupied areas, and (2) declared invalid any attempt to annex East Jerusalem.

Had the United States not joined in to make the statement unanimous, the language would have been much stronger, all sides concede.

Another, and broader, reason for the American action was to encourage among Arab participants a more moderate attitude generally as the nations of the Middle East begin once more to contemplate ways to return to Geneva for discussions of an overall peace settlement.

General Strike In Spain

Spanish workers have staged a 24-hour strike, the biggest labor demonstration since the death a year ago of Generalissimo Francisco Franco, to protest a wage freeze and to demand political and union freedom. Leftists said 500,000 workers of a labor force totalling 8 million joined the walkouts (the Government said 200,000). Club-swinging police broke up demonstrations in Madrid and Barcelona and at least 400 persons were reported arrested. The strike was backed by both the Communist and Socialist Parties.

The Lack of Law of the Sea

Since protracted negotiations seeking a new Law of the Sea have failed to produce agreement on the rights of coastal nations in the so-called economic zone, up to 200 miles offshore, individual countries have begun asserting their claims unilaterally. So far, there has been friction between such coastal nations as the United States and Canada, on one side, and the important fishing nations such as Japan, the Soviet Union, Cuba, Britain and other Europeans on the other; it is likely there will be other disputes as well. The sixth session of the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea will begin in New York next May. Previous sessions have produced general agreement on the extension of the territorial zone, where coastal nations have sole jurisdiction, from three to 12 miles offshore. But no consensus has developed on the economic zone or on the major item of disagreement, undersea mining, and until the whole package is approved no new international sea law treaty is possible.

In the face of the impasse in the United Nations talks, the United States has declared that effective next March 1 it will establish a 200-mile fishing zone. But the boundaries of that zone conflict in some areas with a similar zone proclaimed by Canada and tricky negotiations must be undertaken with the 30 nations whose fishing fleets have traditionally operated within the 200-mile limit. Agreement has been reached with Poland and talks began with the Japanese last week.

The Country Is in Precarious Economic Shape and Has Been Beset by Strikes

Israel Also Must Resolve Internal Political Struggles

By WILLIAM E. FARRELL

JERUSALEM—Israel right now is a bit like a house in which the residents are arguing with one another (the politicians), the roof is leaking (the economy) and hostile neighbors are discussing changing the property line (the borders). The mood of the country is sour and discordant and that has more to do with pressing internal matters than with the ever-present threat from the Arab nations.

The economy is in a very precarious state. Overnight Israelis, already among the most heavily taxed citizens of any country in the world, found they were paying 20 percent more for basic foods and 11 percent more for fuel. With an anticipated inflation rate this year of up to 35 percent, other prices are sure to soar. The country also is undergoing a major period of labor unrest, in part a response to the near-collapse of the Government's fixed wage structure. Once one group gets a pay raise as an exception to the rule, other groups chime in, something Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's ruling Labor Party is discovering in various and clamorous ways.

Last week there were actual or threatened job actions and strikes by X-ray technicians, doctors, seamen, high school teachers, food processers and social workers. These and other discontented worker groups naturally are having an impact in the political arena, already beset by squabbles and travails of its own. Not the least of these is the growing intraparty enmity between Mr. Rabin and the Israeli Defense Minister, Shimon Peres, an ambitious politician who would like the Prime Minister's job.

All of this is occurring against a backdrop of impending Israeli elections, which must be held sometime next year, as well as the end of the hiatus on the diplomatic front that was afforded by the Presidential contest between Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter and the Arab world's latest attempt to end the fighting in Lebanon and turn attention back to Israel. It is widely believed in political and foreign ministry circles here, as well as in American and other circles abroad, that the coming year will see renewed diplomatic activity focused on trying to achieve an overall Arab-Israeli settlement.

There are indications that a number of Arab nations are burying their differences, at least temporarily, in order to marshal international support for their versions of a solution to the Palestinian question and a resolution of the status of the territories captured by Israel in the 1967 war. The words "Geneva peace conference" are beginning to find their way into diplomatic parlance again. And the possibility is on people's minds here that President-elect Carter m[ight want] to make a big splash in foreign policy early in his [adminis]tration and that he might pick the Middle East for [his] international dip.

At this juncture, however, the major focus is inte[rnal...] to pacify the nation's workers caught in an in[flationary] spiral that is threatening to rend the social fabric.

...al French perception of the affair was that ...ly wanted to keep as much of the interna... tional atomic energy market as possible open for its own exporters. There was widespread suspicion that Washington was not above using the threat of proliferation to cover its own commercial ambitions. Besides, strategic experts from many countries have begun to resign themselves to the idea that the spread of atomic weapons is inevitable in the nuclear age, and that the real issue is not how to prevent it but how long it will take and where the first slip-up will come.

Energy shortages provoked by the 1973 oil crisis sharply increased interest in atomic power and fears of dependence on the political whims of outside energy suppliers. It became clear that the usefulness of heavy investment in atomic plants depends necessarily on assurance that atomic fuel will always be available. A reprocessing plant is one guarantee that any country will have its own fuel, although it also guarantees the availability of weapons-grade plutonium.

The dangers for the world are coming to be more keenly appreciated by responsible governments. That is why six countries, including the Soviet Union, responded to Mr. Kissinger's secret invitation to join the "suppliers' club" to set export guidelines after the Indian explosion. Fifteen suppliers are now in the club, although they have yet to reach precise, effective agreements.

French President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing was more sensitive to Mr. Kissinger's private arguments than Mr. Chirac had been to the public ones. The first clear sign of change in Paris came when Mr. Giscard announced the formation under his office of a special national council on atomic energy policy. Until then, bureaucratic quarrels between French ministries and agencies had made it almost impossible to enforce any foreign policy except that of trying to earn francs with exports.

Gradually, French policy shifted until Foreign Minister Louis de Guiringaud declared last month that it is now "parallel" with that of the United States on central issues of nuclear proliferation. Mr. Chirac is out of office. Still, he and his friends are watching these developments and an open French reversal, with France canceling the signed Pakistan contract, would cause trouble here. Instead, the French Government has let it be known that if Pakistan chooses to renounce the purchase, it won't complain. So far, Pakistani officials are taking the stand that it is up to France to renege on its signature if it wants. Besides, the Pakistanis argue, with six nuclear powers, one more wouldn't really hurt the world.

In effect, that has left it up to the United States to find a way to persuade the Pakistanis to back down, as it did when South Korea signed a nuclear deal with France. Canada, which unintentionally provoked the trouble by providing the equipment secretly misused by India, has now joined the fray by threatening to stop supplying the uranium rods Pakistan needs for power if it goes ahead with the reprocessing purchase.

So it seems to be only a matter of maneuvering to save face before the Franco-Pakistani deal is canceled, staving off the proliferation threat a little longer. The demand for nuclear energy and guaranteed fuel supplies is still at least as insistent as the fear of the spread of bombs, however, and proposals to resolve the question are still general and controversial.

Meanwhile, West Germany has an agreement to supply a similar reprocessing plan to Brazil. Presumably, that will come under fire next.

Traditionally, The Lords Are Ignored In Parliament

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

LONDON—That splendid architectural creation of Augustus Pugin, the chamber of the House of Lords, seems an unlikely setting for revolt. True enough, the debate is often spirited—"I thank the noble Lord for his profoundly disappointing statement" is a quite typical sally among members—but the atmosphere of the second house, with its red leather benches, cathedral windows and brouze statuary, is one of stately and even sleepy contentment. It is also, it should be said, a legislative institution with exceedingly modest powers over the life of the nation.

Thus it is always something of a surprise when the House of Lords makes the headlines. But that is what is happening now. And the Lords are doing more than making headlines: Rising nobly above constitutional disabilities, pageantry and eccentricity, the 1,074 Lords and Ladies of the realm are, quite simply, giving Britain's ruling Labor Government an uncommonly hard time.

The Lords are in the news because of five contentious pieces of legislation, some of it the product of the Labor Party's left wing. The legislation would nationalize the shipbuilding and aircraft industries, extend the jurisdiction of the dockworkers union, eliminate beds for private patients from public hospitals, impose "comprehensive" schools on all school districts, and give greater security of tenure to farmworkers.

All five bills passed the House of Commons this summer; all five were revised, in ways large and small, by the House of Lords. The measures then went back to the House of Commons, which had been expected as a matter of routine to delete the Lords' amendments and send them back to the upper chamber in their original form.

On two of the bills, nationalization and schools, the slim Labor majority in the Commons has prevailed. But in what amounted to a stunning setback to the Government, the Commons upheld the changes the Lords had made in the dockworkers bill. The Lords had argued that the bill was little more than a payoff to Jack Jones, the powerful union leader who has supported Prime Minister James Callaghan's economic policy. Two members of Mr. Callaghan's party agreed, and that was all the Conservatives needed to gain their first major legislative victory of the year. But the real triumph belonged to the Lords.

The Origins of Reform

Such triumphs do not come often. Until the Reform Act of 1832, the peers controlled the majority of seats in the Commons through their power over the pocket boroughs. The two houses then became equal in authority, and remained so until 1911, when the Liberal Government, angered by the defeat of its budget, forced through legislation sharply restricting the Lords' power.

Those restrictions were tightened further by the Parliament Act of 1949. The result is that today the Lords have no power over bills dealing with taxation or expenditure; and while they can amend other public bills, the Commons can reject these amendments if it chooses. At this point the game of Ping-Pong effectively stops: The Lords can refuse to consent to the Commons version, but it cannot kill it. The best it can do is to keep the bill from becoming law until the next session of Parliament, which in practice means a year or less.

But even this limited delaying power must be exercised with caution; too much of it would infuriate the Labor Party, create a serious constitutional crisis, and lead, perhaps, to further loss of influence. At least one-quarter of the Commons membership, if not more, would like to get rid of the Lords altogether, and all they are looking for is a sufficient excuse.

There is little doubt that the Lords is, in its present form, something of an anachronism. Some of the peers are young, many are bright, and the more energetic among them have pioneered in liberalizing legislation on homosexuality, abortion, and other controversial issues. But nearly four-fifths of the chamber is composed of hereditary peers, some of whose claims date back to the 13th century. The "life peers" who can be appointed by Prime Ministers (Harold Wilson alone created 107) have changed not only the composition but the atmosphere of the Lords, and studies have shown that of the 300 or so peers who attend more than one-third of the sessions, at least half are "peers of first creation," the other half peers who inherited their titles. Yet the plain fact is that the House of Lords is unquestionably more conservative than the nation as a whole.

A Check, But a Weak One

That said, there are many thoughtful people who would not abolish the Lords simply because it is unrepresentative. The reason is that the House of Commons, whose members are elected, does not always act in ways that can reasonably be called "representative." Britain's is a tradition of party government: the party which wins power is the party which captures the most seats in the House of Commons. This means that as long as members of the party "take the whip" (which they usually do, the dock-issue vote being an exception to the rule), the party in power can push through complex and controversial legislation with much greater certainty than even Lyndon Johnson with his large Democratic majorities. Thus the Lords are seen as a check, albeit a weak one.

It would be wrong to think that in amending the bills as they did, the Lords were acting exclusively in the greater interests of the nation. The Lords are not incapable of teaching moral lessons, and have done so in the past, but they amended the bills mainly because the measures were offensive to Tory instincts.

This does not weaken the case for keeping the House of Lords. What it does do is strengthen the case for making it a more representative (and conceivably more powerful) institution.

One idea, floated but rejected in 1968, would have created a two-tier chamber, giving hereditary peers a voice in debates but reserving real voting power for appointed peers. Another scheme, now being widely discussed, calls for the Lords to be popularly elected on a proportional basis, meaning that its composition would reflect the way the country actually voted. Whatever the answer, the reformers have one goal in common: to make the British system a truly bicameral system of checks and balances by giving the Lords far more than the nuisance value they presently have. In so doing, they hope to change the dismissive attitude towards the Lords implied in W. S. Gilbert's doggerel:

When Wellington thrashed Bonaparte,
As every child can tell,
The House of Peers throughout the war
Did nothing in particular
And did it very well.

Both the Workers ... and the General Union of Workers have ...bill, and it is widely believed that Mr. Suarez ...s it to buy time.

...with the thorny regional questions of the Basque ... Catalonia, the Prime Minister seems to hope ...contain the labor genie until a democratically ...rnment takes office some time next year. It is ... Mr. Suarez, who is being given high marks ...y his opponents, would not mind being the ...ly elected prime minister who let it out of ...

...s leading up to the general strike, the police ...tematic campaign of detaining Trotskyite and Maoist militants, along with some Communist and Socialist union organizers.

Through the Workers Commissions, which may have several hundred thousand "militants," the Communists dominate the embryonic labor scene, with their greatest strength in Madrid, Barcelona, Seville and Bilbao. But the majority of Spain's working population remains unorganized, with laborers often displaying a distaste for outside political control and a determination to handle their own affairs.

Increasingly, those to the left of the Communists have begun to desert the Workers Commissions, though the Communists have tried to avoid the appearance of a "purge" of what is called "the minority line." Memories of Communist-directed purges during the civil war are still fresh on the left in Spain.

Marcelino Camacho, the Communist leader of the Workers Commissions, regularly calls for the creation of a unified trade union movement. But the General Union of Workers, which is the labor arm of the Socialist Workers Party, knows it would be absorbed in such a merger, and has resisted. Aside from pockets in Asturias, Madrid and Bilbao, the riven Socialists simply do not have a mass base. However, they are organizing, with encouragement from friends in Western Europe and, it is thought, even Mr. Suarez.

Last month, the Government prevented the Socialist Workers Party from holding its congress in Madrid, apparently to avoid upsetting right-wingers as the reform bill moves through the Cortes. But Mr. Suarez seems likely to permit the congress in December; he and others in Spain's ill-defined center are counting on the Socialists to offset the Communists in the future.

If the General Union of Workers can get organized, Spain will probably have a large Communist-dominated and a large Socialist trade union. Benefiting from better underground organization during the Franco era, the Communists clearly have a head start. But it is not yet clear who will speak for Spanish labor. Also hanging in a limbo somewhere between tolerance and illegality are the small Workers Syndical Union, which grew out of the left-wing Roman Catholic opposition to Franco, and regional unions that are strong in Catalonia and the Basque country.

"The workers just don't want political control," said one informed Spaniard who has been touring the country. "The S.T.V. [Solidarity of Basque Workers]—that is going to be the model."

With Spain's economy floundering, enlightened capitalists are eager to stabilize the transitional labor situation in order to strike some kind of "social pact." Even the Government acknowledges that its timid austerity measures, crafted to check a runaway external debt and a worrisome rate of inflation, will not do much. A social pact would give Spanish labor, which under Franco was alternately sullen and explosive, an established place in a new political order. Both management and labor seem ready for this. But, so far, the Government has chosen not to legalize facts of life that might irritate the old guard of Francoism. In predemocratic Spain, economics passes through the filter of politics.

In Summary

Mr. Burns Has Economic Advice For Mr. Carter

Administrations and their fiscal policies come and go, but there is always the Federal Reserve Board, its cautious monetary policy and its consistent and cautious chairman, Arthur F. Burns. Last week Mr. Burns let President-elect Jimmy Carter know that, right now at least, he thinks any attempt to speed recovery from the recession is not only unnecessary, but would be dangerous.

Mr. Carter has said that if his economic advisers consider the economy as stagnant in January as they do today, he could consider a tax cut to stimulate consumer spending.

Mr. Burns's testimony before the Senate Banking Committee made it plain that he believes there will be faster economic growth soon. He implied that the Federal Reserve might counter what it considered excessive fiscal action with a monetary one on the ground that fiscal stimulus might also stimulate higher inflation. Mr. Burns and his colleagues on the board took such a step in 1975, because they believed that the antirecession tax cut that was enacted that year was too large.

What Mr. Burns does matters because the Federal Reserve, an institution that is independent of President and Congress, regulates the supply of money available in the economy; changes in the rate of growth of the money supply have a direct impact on the amount of expansion that can occur.

The extent of the potential conflict between Mr. Burns and Mr. Carter will depend on what the economic indicators show in the next two months, and on how Mr. Burns' and Mr. Carter's advisers read them. Mr. Burns is a fiscal conservative, but as he remarked last week, Federal Reserve policy is not "frozen in concrete." After his testimony had been widely understood to mean there might be a severe conflict, Mr. Burns hastened to counter that impression, letting it be known he expected to be able to cooperate with the Carter Administration.

The record shows that he has directed adjustments in the money supply when he thought the economy required them; in other matters, such as Federal aid to New York City, he has softened his opposition after weighing the economic effects.

The board's independence has been complained about recently, especially in Congress, but there have been no serious proposals to change the institution. That is not so in the case of the chairmanship; the term does not coincide with the President's. Mr. Carter, like a number of others, including Mr. Burns's predecessor, has said the chairmanship should be "co-terminous" with the President's. Mr. Burns's term expires in January 1978. He has said he does not intend to resign.

Ford and Carter Saw It Alike

The former opposing camps in the Presidential election have been applying the wisdom of hindsight to the 1976 campaign, and their post-mortems are in substantial agreement.

Campaign aides of the loser, Gerald R. Ford, took credit for having devised a strategy that drastically reduced Jimmy Carter's early lead in the polls and made the election a close one. That strategy was to make Mr. Ford spend much of his time performing Presidential duties in the White House and to emphasize the contrast with Mr. Carter, whom the Republicans portrayed as a man of little executive experience and unknown views.

The President-elect agreed that the Republican campaign had been effective in raising doubts about him, doubts that have survived the election. Mr. Carter maintained, in a postelection interview, that he could not have won without the opportunity, provided by the three televised debates, for reassuring the electorate about his intentions.

A number of other aspects of the election were being assessed last week. They included:

The Carter majority. Because of the narrowness of Mr. Carter's victory in many states, spokesmen for organized labor, big cities and blacks have each claimed credit for having put him over the top. Perhaps the only group that can point to clear evidence of a decisive effect are the voters in Mr. Carter's home region. Of the 11 states in the country where the voter turnout was greater than in 1972, eight were in the South. The relatively heavy turnout brought proportionately more Democrats to the polls, helping Mr. Carter carry almost all the Southern states, the nucleus of his electoral college majority.

Congressional turnover. While the election left unchanged the party balance in the House and Senate, with the Democrats holding a 2-to-1 majority, it did produce many new faces. The House will get 67 new members and the Senate 18, including Gov. Wendell Anderson of Minnesota, who has arranged to resign and have himself appointed by his successor to the seat vacated by Vice President-elect Walter Mondale. The new members of Congress are considered likely to join forces with those first elected in recent years in pressing for rule changes to reduce the power of senior members and to strengthen ethical standards.

Campaign finance. The 1974 law that limited spending and contributions and provided public subsidies is generally considered to have achieved its objective of restricting the influence of large contributors without seriously inhibiting the conduct of the campaign. As a result, an attempt is likely to be made in Congress to extend subsidies to House and Senate elections, a proposal rejected by the last Congress, largely because it was viewed as a threat to incumbents. An increase in the Presidential subsidy, currently $21.8 million for each major party candidate, may also be proposed; the Carter-Mondale forces contended after the election that the allowance was too low.

Navy, Northrop A Sales Team

The United States Navy and an airplane manufacturer have provided what appears to be a classic example of the "military-industrial complex" in action by combining forces to promote a mutually beneficial foreign arms sale that the Pentagon considers questionable.

The manufacturer, the Northrop Corporation, is now the principal subcontractor in the production of F-18 fighters for the Navy. Northrop would like to sell a version of the plane, modified for land rather than carrier use, to the Government of Iran. The Iranians are interested in buying the plane—so interested that they are willing to pay not only the purchase price, $4 billion for a fleet of 250, but the development cost of the land version as well.

The Defense Department is reluctant to approve the sale because it might set two disturbing precedents: It would permit production of a new weapon solely for export, not merely the export of an existing item in the United States arsenal, and it would allow a foreign government direct influence in a weapons development program.

In trying to overcome the reluctance of the Defense Department, Northrop has found an ally in the Navy, which supports the sale for its own reasons: increasing the volume of F-18 production would result in a lower unit price for each of the planes the Navy buys from Northrop.

The Navy-Northrop alliance represents one aspect of the phenomenon that President Eisenhower, a former general, warned of in his last address before leaving office in 1961. He said that the "conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience... In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex."

In this instance, the complex is itself divided. Although the Navy endorses the sale to Iran, the Air Force and the manufacturer of its F-16 fighter, General Dynamics, do not favor the development of a competing airplane for export. The Air Force, too, hopes to realize cost savings on its plane by finding buyers overseas, and the Iranian deal would give the Navy a significant entry into the foreign market.

The final decision will be made by the civilian officials of the Defense Department after first getting an opinion from the State Department on whether the proposed sale would further United States foreign policy interests.

A Pollution Trade-Off

In an effort to compromise the conflict between two national goals, economic growth and the abatement of industrial pollution, the Environmental Protection Agency has devised a trade-off it says will permit the pursuit of both.

The agency plans to adopt what is, in effect, a plan to permit industrial growth, with its attendant new pollution, but only on a "replacement" basis: The additional pollution cannot exceed, in the geographical area involved, the extent to which another pollution source in the area will reduce pollution below existing abatement requirements.

Environmental groups charge that the new policy distorts the intention of the Clean Air Act of 1970. The agency's position is that the trade-off plan will provide cities and states with an incentive to tighten existing procedures, reduce pollution below permitted levels, and make room for new industry and new pollution.

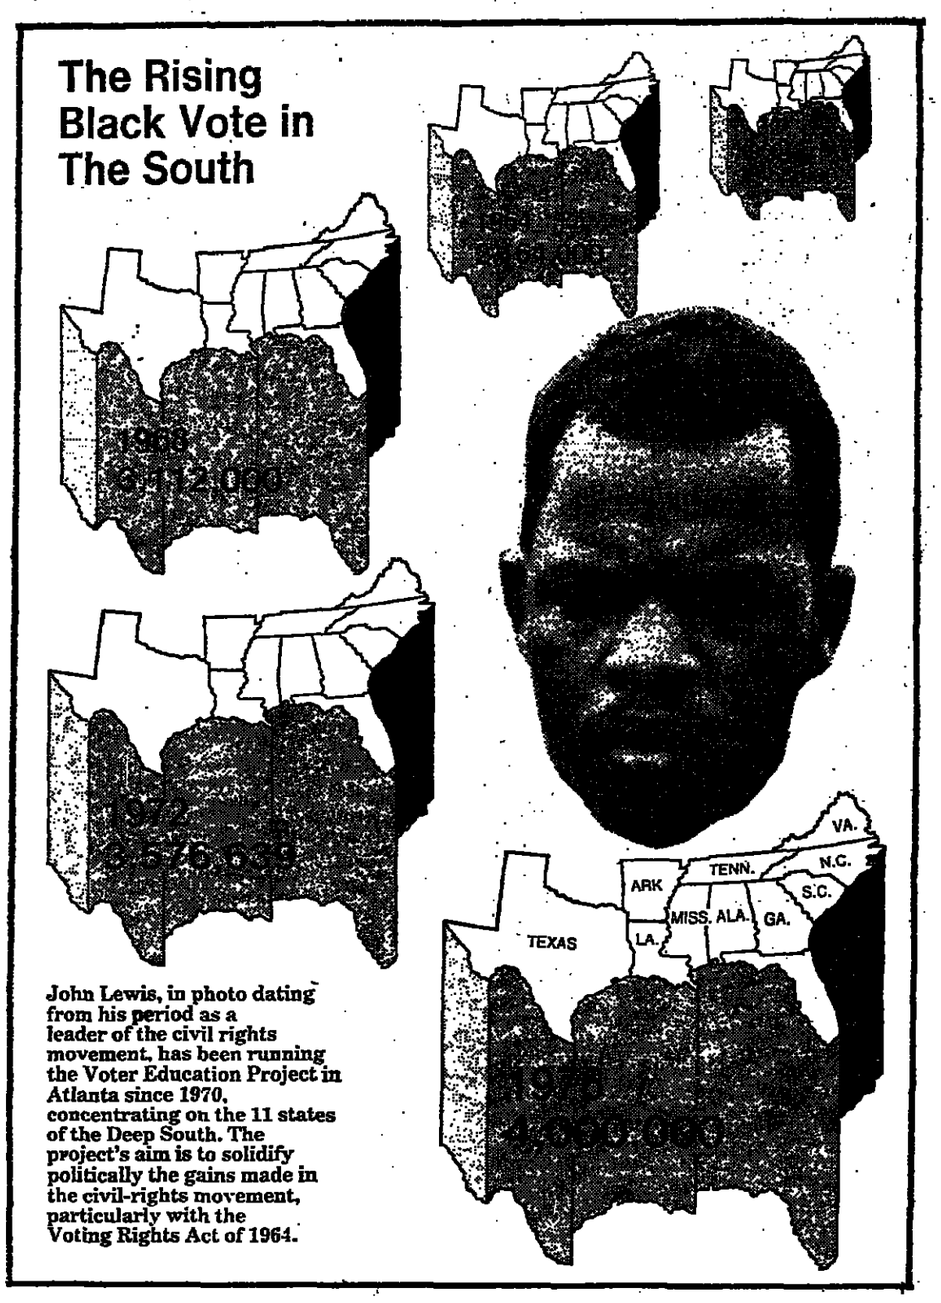
John Lewis Is a Personal Symbol for a Historic Period



John Lewis, in photo dating from his period as a leader of the civil rights movement, has been running the Voter Education Project in Atlanta since 1970, concentrating on the 11 states of the Deep South. The project's aim is to solidify politically the gains made in the civil-rights movement, particularly with the Voting Rights Act of 1964.

Black Passage: From Civil Rights to the Ballot Box

By BRYANT ROLLINS

John Lewis is a name from the past in the American civil rights movement, but it is also a name from the present, and perhaps the future, of American politics. Mr. Lewis, normally the most self-effacing of men, was prideful and expansive last week in declaring, as others have, that Southern black voters had been responsible for electing a Southern white politician President.

The claim is no more susceptible to final proof, or disproof, than others that have been and will be made; the closeness of the vote encourages the claims but also means all the votes are vital for Jimmy Carter. Yet Mr. Lewis has more evidence on his side than most: There has been a peaceful political revolution in the South, and Mr. Carter has been its first beneficiary. For instance:

In 1960 there were only about a million blacks registered to vote in the 11 states of the Deep South; there are now four milion. In 1960 there were fewer than 50 black elected officials; now there are about 2,000. In 1960 any attempt by large numbers of blacks to register to vote, or to organize politically in any effective way, was met with violent resistance by whites; today, black political participation is an accepted reality.

Last week, black voters apparently contributed substantially to Mr. Carter's margin of victory in all the states of the Deep South except Virginia, which President Ford won. In Georgia, whites and blacks alike favored Mr. Carter. Elsewhere in the South, about 55 percent of the white voters preferred President Ford, but over 95 percent of the black voters favored Mr. Carter.

Even that near unanimity would not have mattered had it involved the insignificant black vote of the past. This year, 63 percent of registered Southerners, black and white, voted, compared with 53 percent nationwide.

John Lewis is not the only person responsible for that. Last Sunday in Atlanta he was one of about 100 blacks and whites who attended a reunion of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee—the student-based activist group of the 1960's—that Mr. Lewis once headed.

But there were few in that group, now largely over the antimagical age of 30 and mundanely middle class, who constitute a better individual symbol—both a barometer and a progenitor—of black progress from productive protest against a racist social system to productive groundwork within the political system.

He was born the third in a family of 10 children and raised near Troy, the seat of Pike County, Alabama. When he was three years old, in 1943, his sharecropper father took his life savings—$300—and bought his own farm. There, on 100 acres of mostly cotton in the center of predominantly white farming country, John Lewis was raised in the rigidly segregated environment that prevailed.

That segregation began to break down [illegible] Montgomery bus boycott of 1955, led by Dr. Luther King. The boycott also provoked Mr. interest in nonviolent social protest. He says [illegible]

"It was inconceivable to us that black peopl[e] openly defy white people in the state of [illegible] To see hundreds of thousands of Montgomer[y] refusing to ride the buses, walking together [illegible] and forming car pools, was a moving exp[erience] We used to lie in the dark at night liste[n] the news on the radio."

Mr. Lewis, now 36, is a Baptist minister, a[s] he inclined to when he was 10; Reveren[d] leadership in Montgomery gave form to M[y] aspirations. He decided then not to seek a[n] tional church connection, but to work f[or] change in the deep South, and to adopt a G[an]dhi based, nonviolent social action as his philos[ophy] life.

He gained a reputation during the civ[il] movement years as a mystical person wh[ose] sometimes irrational faith in his own surv[ival] One leader who knew him well said: "Som[e] even the toughest, would occasionally f[ind] situation where they knew they were goi[ng] beaten or jailed. John never did that. H[e] went full force into the fray."

The spirit of nonviolent protest generate[d] King and his associates grew into the most [powerful] social movement since the mass labor o[rganizing] of the 30's. The white South was at first [surprised], then angered and outraged, and the outb[reaks] often expressed violently. Demonstrato[rs] brutally beaten, jailed and some were killed.

Between 1960 and 1966, Mr. Lewis was [arrested] 40 times. His longest term in prison was [served] in the Parchman Penitentiary in Mississipp[i], beaten on many occasions, several times al[most] en to death. In May of 1961, he was left un[conscious] in a pool of his own blood outside the G[reyhound] Bus Terminal in Montgomery after he an[d] of others were attacked by hundreds of w[hite] protestors had been trying to desegregate [the] terminal. Mr. Lewis was saved by a white law enforcement official. He was seriousl[y] again in March of 1965 at the Edmund Pet[tus] in Selma, Ala.

The crash of racial barriers falling t[hroughout] the South was audible in the North; what[ever] so audible were the cries of personal pain t[hat] of the civil rights workers suffered. John L[ewis], concussions, at Montgomery and at Selma[, and] merous other beatings, left him with severe [recurring] pains in his head. Only in recent years have [medi]ical specialists in Boston and New York [finally] relieved some of his suffering.

If the personal pain went unremarked, t[he] ment in which it was incurred did not. The [Public] accommodations act resulted from nation[wide] at the beatings of the Freedom Riders; [the] Voting Rights Act followed the violence [of] troopers in Selma. That legislation is wha[t] Mr. Lewis to change the manner in which h[e] his devotional life.

He had been the chairman of the Studen[t] lent Coordinating Committee from its for[ma]tion 1963 until 1966. He was involved in other [civil rights] projects until 1970, when he began the [Voter Education Project] bore its sweetest fruit on November 2nd.

As head of the Voter Education Project [in] a nonprofit organization funded mostly by [foundation] grants and with a full-time staff of 10, [Mr. Lewis] pursues tactics he used in the civil rights [movement] and his organization's activities during [the 1976] campaign were typical.

He worked with Julian Bond and other [civil rights] blacks for six months in the 11 states of [the Deep] South to register voters, sponsor voter [registration] workshops and help get out the vote o[n Election] Day. More than 100 local organizations [were] nanced.

The voter education project spent about [$2 million], much of it in grants of $1,000 to $2,000 to [local] ters of the Urban League or the National [Association] for the Advancement of Colored People [and] church groups of civic organizations. Ne[arly] the groups were black; a few were bi[racial], some were Spanish-speaking and native [American]. None were white.

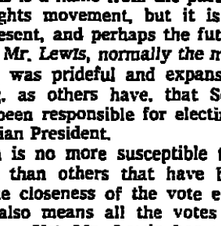
Is Mondale's Work Over or Just Beginning?

'Veep' Problem Still Needs a Solution

By WARREN WEAVER Jr.



WASHINGTON—"I am Vice President," observed John Adams, the first American who could make that statement. "In this, I am nothing. But I may be everything." Later, after some on-the-job experience, he revised his views, calling the post "the most insignificant office that ever the invention of man contrived or his imagination conceived."

In the ensuing 179 years, virtually every Presidential candidate has pledged that the second-ranking official of the United States would be given responsibilities commensurate with his position. With a few minor exceptions, the winning candidate then proceeded to forget about his pledge.

Jimmy Carter has not abused the first part of this hallowed political tradition. Even before he had chosen Senator Walter F. Mondale as his running mate, he promised "a strong role for the Vice President to play in the field of domestic and foreign affairs, in major undertakings that would involve, perhaps, government reorganization, liaison with Congress or as a foreign emissary."

In his television debate with the Republican Vice Presidential candidate, Senator Mondale said he had discussed his prospective duties "extensively" with Mr. Carter and that some of them might concern reorganization of the government and a broad new Federal attack on crime, particularly crime involving narcotics. No one outside the President-elect's inner circle has any firm information about Mr. Mondale's future assignments. One obvious possibility is in what is euphemistically known as Congressional relations. The Democratic Party will enjoy substantial majorities in the House and Senate, but Mr. Carter's contact with Congressional leaders during the campaign was imperfect at best. Using his influence with Senate liberals and moderates, the Minnesotan could do for the President what Vice President John Nance Garner, a former Speaker, did in the House for President Franklin D. Roosevelt in the early New Deal.

From time to time a number of proposals have been made by politicians and academicians in an attempt to structure a more positive role for the Vice President. When he was Senator from New York Kenneth B. Keating unsuccessfully sponsored a Constitutional amendment that would have created two Vice Presidents, one to preside over the Senate and handle legislative relations and a second to serve as an administrative officer in the executive branch. Early in the Kennedy Administration, there was some discussion of making Vice President Johnson a sort of super cabinet officer, but nothing came of it.

There has never been any legal barrier to a President sharing a portion of his authority with the man presumed to be his chief assistant. T[he] the Constitution imposes on the Vice P[resident] presiding over the Senate, voting there i[n] a tie and opening the electoral vote cert[ificates]. have never crowded that official's work [load].

Making the Vice President an ex officio [member] of the cabinet by inviting him to meetings [is a] tively new development, beginning with [Woodrow] Wilson. Foreign affairs assignments for [the Vice] President are also a development of recent [years].

Why have Presidents been reluctant to s[hare] nificant responsibilities with Vice Presidents? [One] reason is that most important matters all[ready] within the jurisdiction of a Cabinet offi[cer] would clearly resent having his authority [usurped]. Another is political jealousy. Successful Pr[esidential] candidates tend by natural selection to be [ambitious] mildly egocentric.

One might expect that a lame-duck [Vice President] might give some valuable exposure to his [successor] mate toward the end of the term by gi[ving him] choice governmental assignments. But, for [political] or other reasons, it has not worked out th[at] way.

ne Unique nd Necessary esidency of erald Ford

By JAMES M. NAUGHTON

NGTON — The President's eyes were red-rimmed, ollowed by fatigue. He sat, in shirtsleeves, in the bin of Air Force One as the silver plane whispered coal-black Southern skies toward the capital. from a white plastic tumbler and coughed, briefly Gerald R. Ford's visitor, pretending not to notice t he was that night last May, was dimly aware alvin Coolidge must have meant in saying, half earlier, "I am only in the clutch of forces that r than I am."

d never had aspired to the Presidency, never had others do, to use it to bold purpose. He seemed ce to have been affected and shaped less by its and powers than most of his predecessors. Yet 1 election in his own right with a single-minded- was almost self-destructive.

d to wonder, recalling that night flight from m to Washington and the hundred others like led his energy, left him voiceless and led ultimate- disappointment, whether Mr. Ford realized then cidental Presidency already had accomplished as ight have been expected of it, given two years Ford legacy, measured not so much in deed as apt to be that of a revival of will. "The President visionary," said one of his colleagues. "But he when we didn't need to look into the future ourselves we had one."

ssessments being made here of an administration end with the inauguration, 67 days from now, nt-elect Jimmy Carter, there was a sense that ed—through fortune more than design—been the at the right time in the White House and that the the better for it.

lent "must think of himself as a link in the long s country's destiny, past and future," said Herbert hose misfortune it was to serve as a link between bust. Mr. Ford's tenure did not encompass so and polar a change in the nation's condition. But ed likely to be judged as a President who achieved stability after chaos; who served, in Hoover's terminology, as the link between the self-doubt and trauma that marked the end of Richard M. Nixon's Presidency and the uncertainty and hope that characterized the beginning of Jimmy Carter's.

The tone of the inevitable appraisals of Mr. Ford's performance was set by Mr. Carter. Perhaps mellowed by victory, the Georgian said after the election what he would not concede before Nov. 2, that Mr. Ford could make a "legitimate and, I think, accurate" claim to have done a good job under trying circumstances.

It was on precisely that basis that Mr. Ford had appealed to the electorate for four years more. He had contended that his Administration produced peace, prosperity and trust. Even allowing for political hyperbole, there was something to that, although not as much as Mr. Ford made out.

Peace — To be sure, it was under President Ford that the United States finally disengaged itself from the torturous involvement in Indochina. The withdrawal was nonetheless reluctant. Even as the regime of President Nguyen Van Thieu crumbled, Mr. Ford was trying in vain to obtain more American military assistance for South Vietnam.

Under Mr. Ford, Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger negotiated a Sinai accord between Egypt and Israel and, after seven years of impassiveness toward the unrest building in southern Africa, began trying to mediate between white minority governments and black nationalists.

The President, making use of a quarter-century of friendships with elders on Capitol Hill, persuaded Congress to increase national security spending and made the requisite symbolic gestures toward partners in the Atlantic Alliance.

Prosperity. After inheriting a combination of inflation and recession, Mr. Ford took credit for having reduced the rate of inflation to roughly half of the double-digit levels it had reached. But joblessness remains high, oil prices threaten to rise unchecked, economists are concerned about the risk of an international monetary crisis and American cities continue to rot at their cores.

Bristling still over Mr. Carter's campaign charge that the Ford Administration could not cite a single major legislative accomplishment, James T. Lynn, the director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, has attempted to quantify the President's record in a list of "Major Legislation Sponsored by the President and Enacted into Law." On Mr. Lynn's list of 27 items are some for which Congress might plausibly claim the initiative, such as the 1975 reduction of Federal income taxes or the Government's bailout of New York City. The list also contains legislation seemingly engendered more by necessity than foresight, such as increased unemployment benefits or assistance to refugees from Indochina. And it bears such relatively inconsequential items as a new target price program for rice production and increased criminal penalties for violation of antitrust laws.

Trust. There was something incongruous about attempts such as Mr. Lynn's to quantify the record of the Ford Administration. Its principal accomplishment was personal and largely unquantifiable — the resuscitation of the Presidency itself. It was, in the end, the character of the President that mattered in the Ford Presidency.

"My hunch is that the man will be treated awfully kindly by history," said James E. Connor, the White House Cabinet Secretary and one of the more thoughtful Ford associates. "Measure his accomplishments against August 1974, when the world seemed bleak and frightening, when every day brought a new surprise, when today didn't look much like yesterday and tomorrow promised to be radically different. The anchors weren't there. The most obvious was the Presidency of the United States. It had damn near been destroyed." If Mr. Ford was seldom inspirational and never visionary — "bring him a problem and he solves it, but he'll never dream up a Peace Corps," said a campaign aide — he was at least steady, at a time when steadiness may have counted for much.

In the weeks preceding Mr. Ford's accession, it had become commonplace to hear demonstrators outside the White House, chanting, "Jail to the Chief." For nearly two years, the attention of the capital and the country had been focused on televised Watergate hearings, courtroom dramas over gaps in White House tape recordings and proceedings intended to bring to trial in the Senate, for the second time in history, a President accused of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Taking office after that, Mr. Ford was, said Mr. Lynn, like a small child thrown into deep water and commanded to swim. He swam. His strokes may not have been powerful or elegant or smooth, but they kept him, and what he represented, afloat.

Mr. Ford was not so candid, not so open as he proclaimed. But he was more candid and open than his most recent predecessors. His theory that the full pardon he granted to Mr. Nixon had been necessary to deflect attention from Watergate to more mundane, but pressing, problems might have been vindicated in the election. A CBS news survey of voters suggested that half of the electorate considered trust a central issue and that, among those voters, Mr. Ford was preferred as a candidate over Mr. Carter.

Even among those who voted for Mr. Carter there was, often, an expression of concern over the rejection of a President who was considered decent. One woman in Virginia said she was disturbed for two days about having voted against Mr. Ford. The existence of such an attitude suggests that the 38th President had served an honorable purpose, that of elevating the standard of performance to an acceptable level and stabilizing the conditions in which the 39th President might attempt to govern.

"Bold strokes can only take place in a setting of bedrock stability," Mr. Connor said. "It's the President's misfortune that stability has never been perceived as important to the nation." The White House aide's analysis of the election's meaning was not dissimilar from that of John Osborne in the New Republic magazine. "The outcome was a majority judgment, in short, that goodness and decency in the Presidency are not enough," Mr. Osborne wrote.

Yet it might also be said that decency counted for something and that gratitude could have been an element of Mr. Carter's post-election remark about Mr. Ford: "He restored confidence in the White House."

The Lame Ducks Can Leave Behind a Nest of Time Bombs

IGTON—The sportsmanlike cordiality with which ord and President-elect Jimmy Carter have begun transition to the new Administration belies the kwardness and the crippling suspension of power oaged American interregnum.

ter touched on the core of the problem at his lection news conference, when he was asked could do anything to help the Ford Administra- off an expected increase in world oil prices that disastrous impact on the ailing American econ- s he takes office.

no responsibility in the government at all," Mr. lied. "And I want to be sure that the American erstand that President Ford is in office. He has control of the Government and full authority to our nation. I have none whatsoever."

uninitiated, Mr. Carter may have seemed either callous, or naively obvious. He was neither. His y echoing the traditional tactics of Presidents- have refused to be lured by their predecessors transition into sharing the responsibility—and —for events or for policy decisions they can not

t-in conflict of interest between incumbents, with for continuity and their urge for a strong finish, ing Presidents, with their emphasis on change preference for a period of drift that will set the he image of bold, innovative leadership they hope on taking office, has made Presidential transitions some of the most precarious periods in American history. Indeed, transition seems too tame a euphemism to capture the gradual loss of élan in an outgoing Administration, the slowdown of policy making, the growing sense of futility about new projects or the anomaly of a retiring President presenting his final budget and making a State of the Union address that is less a program of action than a valedictory for the sake of history.

In the rancorous transition of 1932, with the Great Depression gathering force, Franklin Delano Roosevelt refused repeated entreaties from President Hoover for cooperative action on war debts, a statement to bolster public confidence or finally, on the eve of inauguration, a joint declaration of a national bank holiday. F.D.R. scoffed at the suggestion that "the President-elect dabble with superficial remedies" that would impair his own program. Within 36 hours of taking office, he declared the bank holiday by himself.

So damaging was the Hoover-Roosevelt changeover that the transition period was constitutionally shortened by six weeks. But this did not prevent chilly strains in subsequent transitions.

President Truman was frustrated by Dwight Eisenhower's refusal to help with the Korean armistice negotiations, and President Eisenhower had to endure John F. Kennedy's unwillingness to help on international monetary matters. Just eight years ago, President Johnson was, by his own account, "trying desperately" during his final weeks in office to make headway in the stalled Vietnam negotiations in Paris and wanted Richard Nixon's endorsement for a start on strategic arms talks with the Russians. But Mr. Nixon held himself aloof, causing the Russians to await his accession to power and the North Vietnamese in Paris to filibuster endlessly over the shape of the negotiating table.

There are already signs that the 1976 transition is about to repeat the familiar pattern. It is only natural that President Ford should want to reach out to his elected successor to shore up his waning power on such pressing matters as world oil prices, the shaky economy or the effort to promote a settlement in Rhodesia. But given the philosophical differences between Mr. Ford and Governor Carter during the campaign on defense spending, taxes, unemployment or aid to the cities, the two are understandably at odds now on how to deal with the practical problems of the next ten weeks. And once again, the Russians find no incentive to strike a new bargain on arms control with an outgoing Administration.

On some issues such as a tax cut or production of the B-1 strategic bomber the Ford Administration will probably put policies in motion and leave it to Mr. Carter to stop their momentum, rather than make any attempt at a coordinated approach.

At the windup of the campaign, President Ford made clear his intention to propose a $10 billion tax cut by increasing the personal exemption of all taxpayers from $750 to $1,000. If he includes this in his final budget, as now seems likely, it will put pressure on Mr. Carter, who has so far been hesitant to commit himself to a tax cut and who would presumably favor one that gave preference to low-income families.

The apparent decision of the Ford Administration to proceed with production of the B-1, once the legal ban imposed by Congress expires on Feb. 1, runs counter to Mr. Carter's campaign promises to trim the defense budget by several billion dollars. But as some of his aides point out, Mr. Carter could easily bypass the Ford budget on this and other spending issues by coordinating his own budget plans directly with Democratic budget makers in Congress.

Curiously, despite their philosophical differences over handling the economy, the Ford and Carter camps have parallel interests during the transition. Mr. Ford and his advisers favor allowing the business cycle to come back slowly on its own to what they hope is a natural upward trend, and Mr. Carter's aides, though they believe in more government stimulus and intervention, see no purpose of acting before Jan. 20. "Unless you can predict a certain crisis in the next 70 days," said one Carter aide, "You can't expect Jimmy to move. The precedent of F.D.R. is unmistakable. It may have been brutal. But politically it was right."

Mr. Carter's approach to Federal loan guarantees for New York City if it cannot meet the 1978 deadline for balancing its budget has been considerably more lenient than the Ford Administration's. But Carter aides say privately that for the transition at least, their aims are the same as the President's: to keep pressure on New York to keep a tight rein on expenditures. Similarly Mr. Carter has an interest in seeing the President's policies succeed on several foreign policy issues. His aides say that at the appropriate moment, Mr. Carter may speak out modestly in support of the Republican initiatives on the Rhodesian settlement or the international effort to rescue the British pound.

World oil prices, almost certain to be increased by the ministers of the oil exporting countries in mid-December, pose a much more delicate problem. A significant price hike would play havoc with the American economy and complicate Mr. Carter's already difficult task of bringing down unemployment without dangerously refueling inflation.

At his postelection news conference, Mr. Carter made plain his concern, saying that a price increase "would be a serious blow to the oil consuming nations" and that he hoped that the exporting countries "would be reticent" about raising prices. But he was quick to caution that, not being in office, he could not "do some political or diplomatic persuading to influence the outcome of their decision."

It was a typical transition straddle, one that will frustrate the Ford Administration which privately hopes for more vigorous intervention by Mr. Carter, possibly even a private message to the oil exporters warning of the dangers of the price hike. But that is precisely the kind of maneuver that incoming Presidents have refused to make during the transition period.

In Summary

Medicaid Abuse Apparently Is In the Hospitals

Charges of Medicaid abuse, which have already touched large numbers of physicians, nursing homes, so-called Medicaid mills and pharmacies, now have reached hospitals, both public and private, in New York State. The precise cost of the alleged hospital abuse, which centers on deceptive admissions and billing practices, has not been calculated, but millions of dollars are probably involved.

According to state investigators, some hospitals have admitted patients needlessly just to fill empty beds in order to receive Medicaid reimbursements. In other cases, hospitals billed the Government for days when psychiatric patients were not hospitalized at all but were on therapeutic weekend visits home.

State Health Department officials said they found, for example, that at New York Medical College-Flower and Fifth Avenue Hospitals a three-month-old child had been admitted as a Medicaid patient with an illness diagnosed as dandruff. The child was kept in the hospital for three days and given one shampoo. The daily cost to Medicaid was $226.

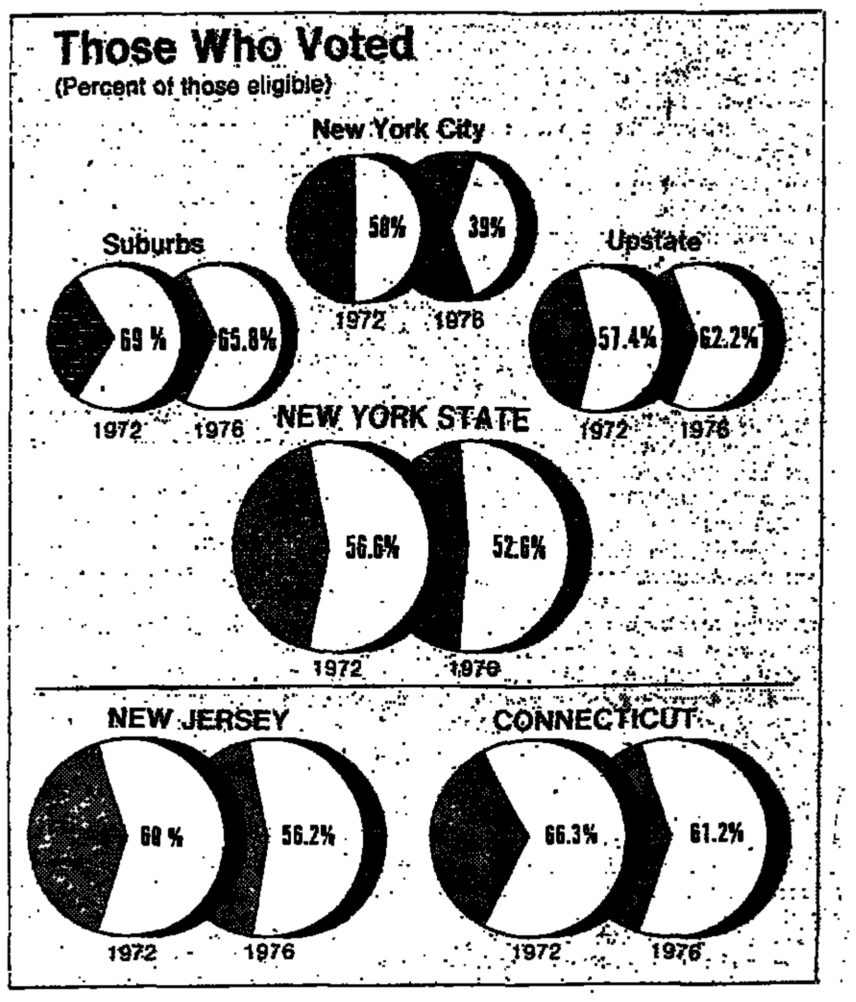
In another case, a man was admitted to St. Clare's Hospital and Health Center on Oct. 26 with a lacerated middle finger. According to state officials, he was kept in the hospital until Nov. 5 awaiting consultation with a plastic surgeon, but was not given any treatment. The daily Medicaid cost: $130.

Also reported by the state study were seven-day-a-week billings for patients, primarily those under psychiatric care, who received weekend leaves. A question of fraud arises because the hospitals reportedly had certified, as they must to receive payment, that the patients were under inpatient care for every day that Medicaid was billed. The hospitals' argument for doing so is that it costs 70 percent of the daily reimbursable rate under Medicaid just to maintain the patient's empty bed.

There were no charges of personal gain in any of the abuses described; they developed, apparently, because the system of reimbursement encouraged them, and because most hospitals depend on Medicaid and private health insurance as major sources of income.

The practices apparently have been going on since Medicaid began in 1966. There has been no investigation until now, the state health department says, because it did not have inspectors to conduct one. The hospital investigation was authorized last spring following discovery of other Medicaid abuses.

New York City's Voter Apathy



Post-election analysis has shown that New York City residents, compared to others in the state, are increasingly uninterested in voting in Presidential elections. The percentage who went to the polls generally has been lower than the state average in the last two decades, and dropped sharply in the election Nov. 2. In the same period, participation in the suburbs has grown. (No comparable studies have been made in Connecticut and New Jersey.)

The city's record, along with its population decline, could help induce parties to choose candidates and emphasize issues more acceptable to the suburbs and upstate at a time when the city particulary needs governmental attention.

Why are fewer city residents bothering to vote? There are probably many reasons, including the large exodus in recent years of college-educated middle class residents who vote in larger percentages than residents with less schooling and income. Experts usually cite also the feeling, especially in black and Puerto Rican neighborhoods, that little attention has been paid by elected officials to deteriorating economic and social conditions.

Here is how the city and suburban vote has changed: New York City, with 41.6 percent of the state's population, cast only 32.6 percent of the state's vote on Nov. 2. That is down 4 percent from the 1972 election and 10 percent from the election in 1960, when the city held 46.1 percent of the state's population and cast 42.4 percent of the votes.

The disinclination to cast ballots was far greater in black and Puerto Rican districts in the city. There, the percentage that voted was half or less the participation level in white districts.

The four suburban counties of Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester and Rockland, with 20.5 percent of the state's population, cast 23.2 percent of the vote on Nov. 2. In 1960, these counties had 17.2 percent of the population and 18 percent of the vote.

Plans to Curb Pornography

In yet another confrontation with pornography, New York City's Mayor Beame has proposed new zoning regulations to curb sex business throughout the city and particularly on 42d Street and Eighth Avenue in Manhattan. The regulations would ban all pornographic establishments within 500 feet of zoned residential areas, and would allow only three such shops and movie theaters within a 1,000-foot radius in commercial districts. This means that no sex stores would be permitted on Eighth Avenue, and only three would operate on each side of each block on 42d Street.

Mr. Beame's proposed ban is modeled in part on zoning regulations in Detroit which were upheld by the United States Supreme Court. It could become law in January.

Monthly rentals for Times Square area pornographers have increased and range from $1,000 for poor locations to $9,000 for prime spots; it is estimated that a busy massage parlor can bring in $2,800 a day.

Port Authority, Profit and Loss

In the midst of New York City's transit money problems, New York State's Comptroller, Arthur Levitt, has reported that the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey last year produced a net profit of $38.5 million —$10.5 million more than it made in 1974. Although the authority would prefer to stay away from mass-transit projects and the deficits that usually attend them, it is under pressure from both states' governors and legislatures to invest in regional public transportation, and it will do so. To what extent is not yet known.

Mr. Levitt's audit of the complex authority finances produced no surprises. Most of the profit came from passenger tolls from the authority's six bridges and tunnels; toll rates increased 50 percent last year and toll profits almost doubled; the higher rates failed to discourage traffic, which rose by one and a quarter million vehicles last year. drawn a substantial numomestic flights away from here domestic landings and ve declined by 47 percent Kennedy also has shown the most marked decrease in domestic passengers—27 percent since 1967.

Meanwhile, international operations at Kennedy are down by nearly as much, largely because of the decline in overseas traffic. But in addition, an increasing number of travelers from other parts of the United States no longer have to leave from Kennedy for overseas trips because new planes allow flights over greater distances.

The big loser in the region is Newark Airport. A major expansion was begun there just as regional traffic was starting to decline. Today, the grand new international arrivals building is a shell; completion has been delayed indefinitely. The old North Terminal, refurbished as an international arrivals building, is virtually closed because Newark's overseas flights have all but disappeared.

Even its domestic routes, sharply trimmed during the energy crisis, dropped by another 4.7 percent last year and are now 40 percent below the 1969 peak. Similarly, domestic passenger traffic was down 3.6 percent last year, bringing the drop since 1969 to 15 percent.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which runs all three airports, has lowered the high landing fees at Newark with as yet undetermined results.

The Port Authority concedes that Newark needs better transportation to New York City. Although buses run from the airport to Manhattan, few known about them. New York taxi drivers charge double the meter, or about $30, from Manhattan because they expect to return empty. Recently, an experiment with group riding was begun but the prospects are uncertain.

The recent trends, both in the region and in the nation, have caused the Port Authority officials, along with national forecasters, to lower predictions for traffic growth. By 1980, the Port Authority calculates, 49 million passengers a year will use the region's airports. Only a year ago it had forecast 55 million passengers by that year.

The lower predictions have put an end to talk of the need for a fourth jetport in the region. Even the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, which in 1973 was calling for the expansion of Stewart Airport in Orange County into a jetport, now agrees that the present facilities are sufficient.

Not only does it now appear that three major airports are sufficient, but there are no major expansion or construction projects planned at the existing facilities aside from a tiered parking lot for La Guardia.

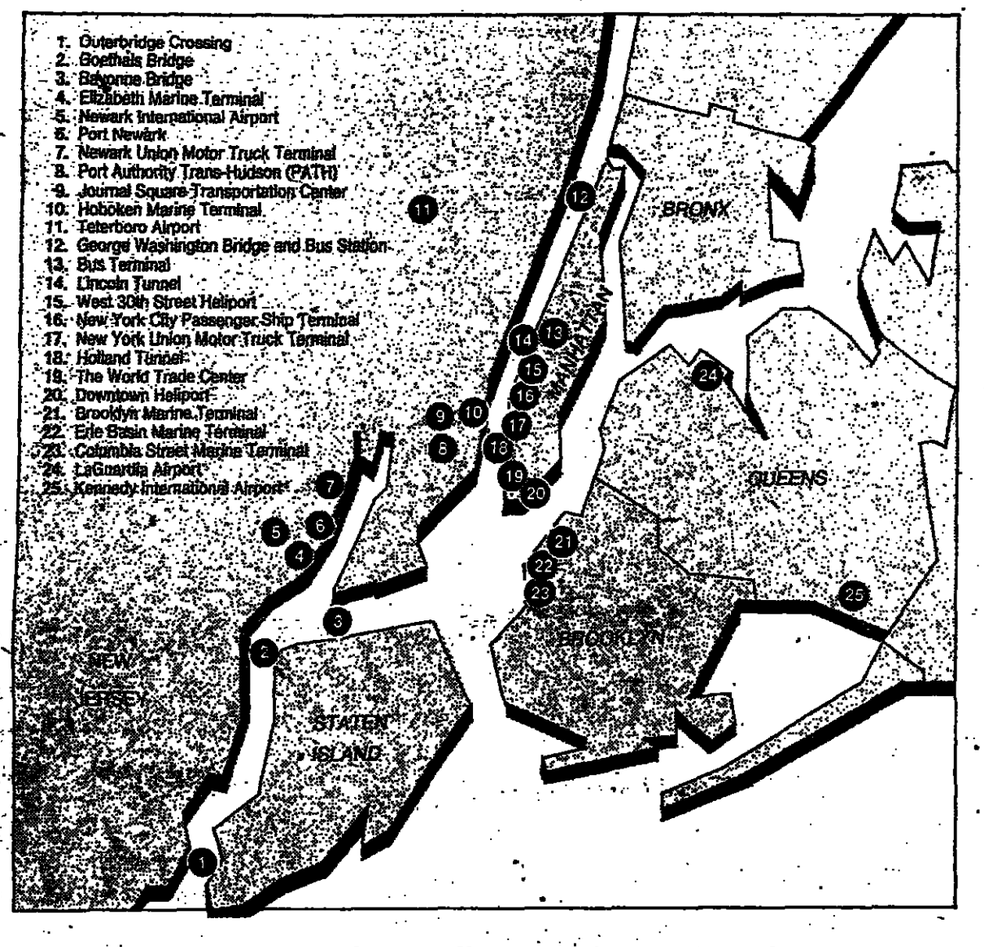
The decline of airport traffic has also cost jobs. At the end of last year, 53,914 people worked at the three terminals, a drop of nearly 10 percent from 59,727 in 1969 and wage increases have slowed to less than the inflation rate. The decline has brought hardship for the Port Authority, too. Its income from the air terminals dropped by 28 percent last year.

The decline of airport business has an effect on the region's economy. In 1972, George P. Howard, an aviation economist with the Port Authority, estimated that after the dollars worked their way through the local economy, each airport job meant another 1.4 jobs within the region. By that logic, the drop in employment has meant the loss of another 8,000 jobs in the area.

More easily gauged is the impact of the falling traffic on New York City's governmental revenues. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1971, the city received $5.7 million from the Port Authority for Kennedy and La Guardia. By 1974, the figure had reached $11.4 million but last year it dropped to $7.4 million.

What is the outlook for these three airports? Traffic has climbed in the first half of this year, although by a rate far lower than the national average. This, the experts say, will be the region's lot for the forseeable future: A declining share of a growing business.

Steven Rattner reports on financial news for The New York Times.



The Port Authority's Sprawling Empire

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey is a quasi-public corporation created 55 years ago by the legislatures of both states to develop transportation within a 25-mile radius of the Statue of Liberty. It controls not only the region's four airports, but also six interstate tunnels and bridges, two helioports, seven marine terminals, a bus terminal, a bus station, two motor truck terminals, the Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corporation (PATH), the World Trade Center, and a bus-rail station in Jersey City, N.J.

Last Gasp of Lame-Duck Bureaucrats

Little Logic, Less Help in HEW Charges

The United States Department of Health, Education & Welfare has accused the New York City school system of practicing employment discrimination. The charges were outlined in a 14-page letter from Martin H. Gerry, director of HEW's Office of Civil Rights to New York City School Chancellor Irving Anker. The Gerry report is one of those bureaucratic documents which people who want to undermine the credibility of federal agencies will love. It is both illogical and destructive, and it will bring even more chaos, confusion and conflict to our schools—which are still reeling from massive budget cuts.

Gerry charges that New York City schools discriminate in hiring because the percentage of minority teachers (13.2%) is much smaller than the percentage of minority group students in the schools (66.2%). But even a child knows that we do not recruit teachers from the ranks of students. Rather, teachers are recruited from the adult population, from those who have completed four or five years of college and university work—and from those who want to go into teaching. But Gerry ignores this point because it just doesn't lead to the conclusion which he embraced before he went out to find the supporting facts.

Gerry shows that other cities—Chicago, Philadelphia, Los Angeles and Detroit—have a much higher percentage of minority group teachers and again deduces that New York City must be engaged in acts of discrimination. But he refuses to look beyond the numbers. Do some of these cities have more black teachers because their local colleges had larger numbers of black students and graduates? Or, have some school districts hired a larger percentage of minority teachers by setting different standards for each racial and ethnic group? Since Gerry makes no attempt to find other possible reasons for the differences, we do not know whether the figures prove discrimination or whether they stem from other causes.

Gerry attacks the use of entrance exams for teachers—because the tests allegedly have an "adverse racial impact" and they are not "job related." But no evidence is cited. Granted that no test we know of can predict whether or not a person will turn out to be a good teacher, tests can tell us whether the prospective teacher can read, write and spell. Is it really unreasonable and discriminatory to ask a future math teacher to solve a few of the same problems which he or she will be asking future students to solve? If the test is really far out and unrelated—why doesn't Gerry show us examples?

Gerry shows that minority group teachers are "segregated" in that they are heavily concentrated in schools in which most of the children are also from minority groups. But how did this happen? It came about because only a few years back people like Gerry told the cities to move toward decentralization and community control so that local communities could hire their own teachers. The UFT and integrationist civil rights leaders like Bayard Rustin and A. Philip Randolph warned that local hiring would mean racial hiring and that there would be increased separation. That is exactly what has happened—and it should come as no surprise to anyone. It is the direct result of the actions of earlier bureaucrats who spread the word that black children must have black teachers. If we are to avoid such segregation, then we must take the power to hire away from local boards and return it to the Central Board—or we must require each local board to hire a quota of each type of teacher.

In another part of the report, Gerry shows that while about 60% of that staff eligible for promotion to principal and assistant principal positions are women, only 26.8% actually in these positions are women. Gerry cites as a major reason for this apparent discrimination "the use of vague and subjective employment criteria." What he should have said was that many more women were promoted when success depended on objective examinations than are now promoted on the basis of subjective interviews by largely male school boards.

No one can deny that New York City schools have a problem. There should be more minority group teachers and supervisors and more women in supervisory positions. But we will not achieve these goals through Mr. Gerry's smear campaign. Instead of demeaning New York City and its schools, perhaps Gerry could do something constructive—

- Get New York schools some more money so we can rehire laid-off teachers, many of them from minority groups.
- Get us some funds to broaden the career ladder program for paraprofessionals—the largest source of future minority group teachers.
- Save the City University of New York, so that thousands of minority group students can graduate to become teachers in the future.

But I'm sure we can't expect that from Mr. Gerry, an appointee of the Nixon-Ford Administration. His report is designed to pit white against black, union militants against civil rights activists—the very coalition that united to defeat Ford and elect Carter and Mondale.

Let's hope that Gerry's attempt to stir up a fight fails and that all connected with our school system—teachers, parents, supervisors, the Central Board and community school boards—unite to obtain desperately needed funds. Then we can have meaningful and non-discriminatory affirmative action within the context of a healthy city and a school system that provides genuine educational opportunity to every child.

Court Permits Abortions Under Medicaid

The Supreme Court has refused to stay an order, issued last month by a Federal District judge in Brooklyn, directing the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and all Medicaid providers to continue financing the cost of abortions to Medicaid patients.

The Government is expected at some later time to appeal the original decision by Judge John F. Dooling, striking down the so-called Hyde Amendment, which cut off abortion funds from an H.E.W. appropriations bill. In the meantime, Medicaid funds will continue to be available to women who decide to terminate pregnancies on the same basis as if they had decided to proceed with pregnancy and childbirth.

The amount of Federal Funds being spent on abortions is not precisely known. Government lawyers estimated that during the current fiscal year Federal expenditures for abortions might range from $22 to $27 million.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare estimates that about a million abortions took place in the United States in 1973, and that of these about 27.8 percent were paid for under Medicaid programs. The department further estimates the cost of an abortion at around $180, yielding a figure somewhere between $40 and $50 million for all aid to abortion by Government agencies, both state and Federal.

Channeling Information

The use of home television sets as data banks that viewers can tap for information on a variety of subjects became a reality in Britain last week and a possibility for set owners everywhere.

For the last two years, the British Broadcasting Corporation has been experimenting with a system called Ceefax, which blanks out regular television pictures and transmits weather forecasts, racing results, entertainment listings and other information at the touch of a few buttons. The British government has pronounced the system a success, and it will now be offered as a regular BBC service.

So far, only 500 sets (including Queen Elizabeth's) are equipped with decoders to translate signals sent out by a BBC computer dubbed Esmeralda. The prototype decoders cost $2,000 each, but the British subsidiary of Texas Instruments, which makes them, predicts that mass production will bring the cost down to $100.

Other "teletext" systems, one of which would permit users to dial information requests on the telephone, are being tried experimentally in Japan and in Britain. "There isn't any doubt in our minds that this is a coming thing," one of the experimenters said.

Any Minority Can Suffer

A new study has highlighted a little noted byproduct of school integration, the opportunity it gives some white children to experience minority status. Not unexpectedly, the study shows that for whites as well as blacks, minority membership can hurt.

Barbara A. Libarkin, a white researcher at Catholic University in Washington, D. C., studied 45 white children in Grades 3 to 6 of a Washington public school where enrollment is 80 percent black. Most of the school's pupils, both black and white, are the children of upper middle class parents who favor integration. The school has a black principal and more black than white teachers. The curriculum emphasizes black history and culture.

Mrs. Libarkin discovered that the white children felt isolated, discriminated against and even defective. "Bernadette has long blond hair," Mrs. Libarkin wrote of one of her subjects. "In the first grade, the black children fondled her hair and called her beautiful. By the fourth grade, she was hit, called 'honky,' excluded and picked on by some black girls."

Exactly like blacks in predominantly white schools, Mrs. Libarkin's white subjects wanted desperately to belong. Some of the children told their parents they wished they were black. One blond child came back from an interracial camping trip "with her hair cornrolled," Mrs. Libarkin reported.

Many white youngsters became experts at talking black English. As a boy named Joe explained, "I figured if I talked like one of them, they'd say, 'He's one of us; he's a real cool kid.'"

Despite everything, blacks and whites in the school played together and slept over frequently at each other's houses. Most of the time, they liked each other. "My best friend is black," a white sixth-grader told Mrs. Libarkin, "and he and I are on the exact same wave length on everything."

The white pupils often became racially colorblind. A typical child talked about "the prettiest girl" in her class without bothering to mention that the girl was black. And when the white children were asked to identify their playmates by race, they could not always do so.

The Decline Of R.O.T.C.

The end of the Vietnam war and the reduced size of the all-volunteer army have resulted in a corresponding reduction in the membership of the Reserve Officers Training Corps, from 109,705 students in the academic year 1969-70 to 39,346 in 1974-75. Nevertheless, students who wish to graduate as officers continue to enroll. Suffolk County, L.I., police are now investigating the death of one such student in what the police have called a combination war game and hazing party on a small island off the south shore of Long Island.

Thomas Fitzgerald, a junior at Queens College but a member of the training corps unit at St. John's University in Jamaica, Queens, was stabbed to death on Nov. 5 while play*ing the role of a prisoner of war.* The police have charged James Savino, a fellow corps member and a student at Stevens Institute of Technology, with second-degree murder. Mr. Savino's attorney maintains the death occurred during an accident in a training program.

Though the pressure of the draft no longer exists, there are still incentives, aside from officer service, to attract students to the training corps. All students in the advanced course—the last two years of college—receive $100 a month in financial aid. In addition, students who can qualify are eligible for Army scholarships, which pay tuition and all other educational costs at colleges affiliated with the training corps. There are about 6,500 such scholarships now in effect.

R.O.T.C. benefits to the colleges involved are more indirect. At Princeton, for example, where the program was nearly phased out during the student unrest of the 1960's, Dean of the College Neil L. Rudenstine pointed out that the presence of the training corps may attract a group of students interested in a military career and that the college's tradition of public service might be construed to include the training of military officers. In addition, there is some material benefit in that Army financial aid to training corps students may replace funds the college might otherwise have to supply.

As for the Army, it profits by receiving commissioned officers—4,567 in 1976, including 150 women, the R.O.T.C.'s first female graduates.

How Free Is Free Speech?

The Supreme Court has agreed to decide another in a series of cases testing the degree to which freedom of speech protects the words and actions of advertisers.

The Justices will review a lower court decision upholding a Willingboro, N.J. ordinance that bans "for sale" signs in front of houses on the ground that such signs may lead to panic selling by white homeowners in integrated neighborhoods.

After the law was passed in 1974, real estate brokers objected that it infringed on their constitutional right of free speech. A Federal District Court agreed, but a Federal Appeals Court ruled that "the promotion and maintenance of integrated public housing is of the highest public interest" and outweighs the rights of advertisers.

In 1942, the Supreme Court found that the First Amendment guarantee of free speech does not apply to "purely commercial advertising."

Last May, the Court reversed itself. Ruling that states cannot ban advertising of drug prices by pharmacists, the Court held that advertisers are entitled to at least some First Amendment protection.

Just how much is not yet clear. The Court based its pharmacy decision less on the seller's right to advertise than on the buyer's need for a "free flow of economic information." The Court emphasized that the states could still ban deceptive advertising. And Chief Justice Warren E. Burger stressed that the Justices were leaving "to another day" the question of whether doctors and lawyers may advertise.

That day will come some time soon; this fall the Court is to hear arguments on the constitutionality of lawyers' ethical canons against advertising.

Church Affirms Views on Sex

The outlook for early liberalization of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States has dimmed: The nation's bishops last week reaffirmed traditional Catholic views on sex.

By a vote of 172 to 25, the bishops approved a pastoral letter upholding the church's prohibition against divorce, artificial birth control, abortion, extramarital and premarital sex and homosexual acts.

The letter had been two years in the writing and was not a res[ponse] to the reform proposals advance[d last] month in Detroit at a "call to a[ction]" conference of priests, nuns and [lay]men. The bishops are to vote on proposals next spring.

Despite their disappointmen[t, re]formers saw a glimmer of hope [in a] development. An unexpectedly [large] number of bishops, 65 out of 22[...], supported an unsuccessful move to [post]pone action on the letter until th[e De]troit proposals had been full[y ex]plored.

Reforming the Campaign Reform

The public financing of Presidential campaigns has come through its first trial very well—which is not to say perfectly. Those who have long opposed the domination of American politics by big money can feel gratified that for the first time since the earliest days of the Republic a President will soon assume office without obligation to distribute ambassadorships, Cabinet posts and other plums as quid for the quo of generous campaign contributions.

On the negative side, the electorate has endured a contest in which the principals had to make do with inadequate funds. Given the choice between raising their own money and subsisting on a Federal campaign allowance, they took the $22 million allotted to each, setting an invaluable precedent. But the money was not nearly enough to allow them to do the educational job that needed to be done. It did not permit them to draw people into the campaign, particularly as volunteers, in ways that would give large numbers of them a personal stake in the process.

The result was that the campaign was one of the dullest in recent history, lacking color and excitement. Worse by far, the stinginess of the campaign created an atmosphere—dangerous in a democracy—in which the electorate appeared to be indifferent about the whole procedure if not indeed about government itself.

Overcoming this most obvious flaw in the revised law should not be difficult. The Presidential campaign allowance for 1980 should simply be increased, and by more than an inflation factor. If checkoff payments over the next four years are at the same rate as for the two past years, there will be nearly $150 million on hand for the next Presidential contest. That should allow a substantial increase with enough left over to pay a sizable amount toward campaigns for Senators and Representatives as well, should Congress authorize that extension of the public campaign-finance concept.

Next: Congress

We believe that Congress should do just that. In this year's election much of the special interest money that once would have gone to the Presidential candidates went into Congressional campaigns instead. Where special interest groups—business, professional, labor, agricultural—invested $12.5 million in the Congressional races in 1974, as much as $25 million is believed to have been poured into them in 1976. To discourage a flood of candidacies by frivolous or demagogic self-promoters, Federal money for Congressional campaigns might well be put on a matching basis for the regular election, as they are now in Presidential primaries.

Other important changes in the reform law also deserve serious consideration. To restore the kind of popular interest that was so conspicuously missing this year, Congress might think about allowing local party committees to lay out money for buttons, stickers, facilities for volunteers and the like without counting the expenditure against the present drastic spending limits.

Not least, something must be done to right the financial wrongs that now exist with respect to minority party and independent candidacies. These should have to demonstrate that they have recognizable constituencies and are not simply out for a free ride. But once they have done so—by petition signatures or bona fide nominations—the private fund-raising that ought to be required of them could be supplemented by Federal matching grants.

The TV Question

Finally, the question of television time cries out for examination and solution. It may be that allowing a Eugene McCarthy the privilege of debating with the major party nominees would have opened the door to ten-man debates and chaos. But that conclusion is where the problem begins, not where it ends.

The air waves are public property, and in a campaign they are worth millions of dollars in cash. They should serve all legitimate candidates. If this cannot be achieved via debates, then the debates should be replaced by another format.

Like most complex reforms, the new campaign finance law has inequities and flaws. But the 1976 campaign has demonstrated the reform's basic value, and indicated the full benefit that can be expected to come to the nation once it is further improved.

Quebec's Critical Vote

Quebec's voters go to the polls tomorrow in an election that has revived dramatically the question of whether that largely French-speaking province should remain in the Canadian federation or strike out on its own as an independent nation. Interest in that issue was intensified last week by an opinion poll which showed twice as much support for the separatist Parti Québécois as for Premier Robert Bourassa's Liberal Government.

The poll's results are almost unbelievable, though it must be noted that they list 30 percent of Quebec's voters as still undecided—an unusually large figure less than a week before an election. It should also be recalled that the Parti Québécois always wins a far larger share of the popular vote than it does of the 110 seats in the provincial legislature that Quebec grandly calls the National Assembly.

Still, the possibility exists that Quebecers will elect a Government pledged eventually to lead the province to independence and thus to dismember Canada. And even if the Parti Québécois should fall short of victory but increase the 31 percent share of the vote it won in 1973, it will have kept separatism very much in the forefront of political debate in Quebec.

In the closing days of the campaign, the hard-pressed Liberals are emphasizing not their record in office for the last six years but what they claim would be the catastrophic economic effects of a Quebec secession. For their part, the separatists are soft-pedaling separatism and are emphasizing high unemployment, corruption and inefficiency under Liberal rule.

This kind of political climate is disappointing to all who, along with Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, hailed Mr. Bourassa's landslide of three years ago—the Liberals then won all but eight Assembly seats—as "a great triumph for federalism over separatism." But it was Mr. Bourassa's decision—still not satisfactorily explained—to dissolve the Assembly and call this election three years before the end of his term; so he and the Liberals, both in Quebec and in the national Government in Ottawa, must live with the result.

Wrong Response

Publication by the Federal Government of the names of 2,500 doctors, dentists, laboratories and pharmacies as recipients last year of more than $100,000 each in Medicaid payments constitutes no slur against the medical profession. It merely suggests that there have been some practitioners who treated the Federal-state health program for the poor as a means of getting rich.

It is unfortunate that the American Medical Association has responded to the disclosures with angry defensiveness. Publication of the list, which suggests that Medicaid has been viewed as a pork barrel by some—though not necessarily all—of the 2,500 who together collected a total of $443.5 million in payments, does not (as an A.M.A. spokesman charged) make doctors "the whipping boy of publicity-seeking bureaucrats and politicians." It is rather an attempt to hold doctors accountable for their use of public funds.

The virtual stampede by bright young men and women in search of admission to the nation's medical schools hardly suggests that the profession suffers from an image tarnished by unfair attacks. On the contrary, Americans rightly respect and handsomely reward a profession with so vital a mission, one the majority of doctors discharge with both skill and dedication.

It is precisely because medicine deservedly enjoys a prestige afforded to few other professions that it also bears a special responsibility to police its ranks and to cooperate with those outside it who are charged with preventing and exposing misconduct.

The composite picture of ruthless exploitation of Medicaid funds by far too large a minority of health professionals is sufficiently convincing to call for organized medicine's cooperation in stopping a raid on the public treasury at the expense of all taxpayers and especially the poor.

Alexander Calder

From Lincoln Center to Jerusalem to Japan, in open plazas and in confined museums, the genius of Alexander Calder's mobiles and stabiles will continue to delight men, women and children. By liberating sculptural forms and dispatching the most mundane materials into his twirling universe, he evoked smiles and sent imaginations soaring.

Calder and his work were quintessentially American, yet he was at home in two worlds, living in France and the United States, bridging art schools of past and present as his engineered sculpture bridges the space of the public places. He could work with the finest wire to create circus figures the size of a child's toy, or vast geometric forms of the toughest steel plate sixty feet high that commanded the passerby to pause, think and enjoy, with faith in human creativity revived.

While many of his works seemed to reach for the heavens, Calder was very much a man of this earth, with an expansive heart for his family and friends. He was a public person, too—a fighter against war, artistic infringements, censorship and injustice. In every measurable way, Alexander Calder was a big man.

Mid-November

By mid-November, the year, like the thistle heads in the rural pasture, begins to fray out. The leaves have fallen from most of the trees. Migrant birds have gone south. Winter is just ahead.

Not long ago an architect, obviously not one of those who build towering, windowless boxes, said that man, even in an urbanized environment, needs "the vital stimulus of shifting light, passing time and the changing of the seasons." Maybe that is why the insistent countryman lives where he does. Not because he likes to milk cows or grow corn or go fishing or hunting now and then, but for that "vital stimulus." That may well be why he doesn't look on winter as such a dour, forbidding season. He is constantly aware of changing time, of shifting light. He knows these things in his bones, the way a wild goose does.

He does have seasonal chores. But that is a part of his life. He has to prepare for winter, even if gasoline and electricity take most of the back-breaking labor out of rural life today. They can't do a man's thinking for him, and they don't respond to that "vital stimulus." So now he has taken in his late harvest. He has snugged his buildings, protected his water lines. He has checked the barnyard fences. And, since he likes an open fire for those "middling" days and those long evenings, he has made sure he has plenty of firewood. Down in his bones he knows what time it is.

The Foreign Police Agents on Our Soil

To the Editor:

I would like to make several additions to your overdue editorial [Nov. 5] protesting activities in the U.S. of secret police agents of foreign powers.

In most instances, such as in the case of Iran's SAVAK and the DINA (Chilean secret police), foreign agents are acting with the direct or tacit cooperation of the C.I.A. The SAVAK and the DINA are, in effect, foreign subsidiaries, branch offices of an American parent company. Therefore, your appeal would have been more effective if it had been addressed to the C.I.A.

Secondly, I find your defense of the right of political asylum somewhat ironical. Surely you must realize that this right has been one of the most political, one of the most selectively applied of all rights, from the post-World War I period to the present. The Immigration and Naturalization Service has made it virtually impossible for refugees from American-backed reactionary dictatorships, such as those from Brazil, Chile, Argentina, etc., to immigrate to the United States, while, at the same time, facilitating the entry into the United States of former officials of the Thieu Government, Eastern European ex-Nazis and the like.

To the Editor:

Your excellent editorial "U.S.—No Trespassing" (Nov. 5) properly called upon our Government to protect American sovereignty against intrusion by the intelligence agents of foreign governments. As the recent murder of Orlando Letelier suggests, "intelligence operations" can now encompass political assassination, and the victims of such operations can, as in that instance, include an American citizen who just happened to be riding in the car carrying the enemy of the Chilean junta. But beyond the scope of your editorial lies another essential issue. How can we expect foreign intelligence agencies to forgo intrusion here unless we renounce the option ourselves overseas? Surely, in the eyes of the world the penetration of American society by the SAVAK, Korean C.I.A. and Chilean DINA is trivial beside the penetration of many foreign societies by our C.I.A. The Senate Select Committee investigations revealed the extent to which the C.I.A. was deeply involved in a variety of assassination plots directed against foreign heads of state and high officials. The golden rule of reciprocity applies to international relations. We cannot hope, nor should we, for domestic tranquillity unless we are prepared to accord it to foreign societies. It is time, I believe, for our sake and for the sake of others, to reconsider whether we want or need the C.I.A. to perform covert operations (other than information gathering) in foreign societies. Until we raise this question for ourselves, it is somewhat disingenuous to complain about others. Or if not disingenuous, then at least it seems like an unwarranted claim of "innocence" or, worse, an unseemly insistence on "imperial prerogatives."

An 'Obsolete' System

To the Editor:

The Presidential election of 1976 clearly shows the urgent need for a constitutional amendment to abolish the Electoral College. For those of us who stayed up late Tuesday night and Wednesday morning to discover if Mississippi's seven electoral votes or Hawaii's four would put Carter over the top, this conclusion is inescapable. While the popular vote was Carter's by a small yet decisive majority, he could easily have lost in the Electoral College by the switch of a few thousand votes in a handful of key states. In fact, Senator McCarthy succeeded in denying him electoral votes in Maine, Iowa and probably Oregon.

The obvious trouble with the system is the "winner take all" nature of the Electoral College. If a state is carried by one vote, its entire electoral vote goes to the winner. We have long been aware of the absurdities of this obsolete system, but 1976 has made change a vital necessity. Can one imagine an America four years from now where a candidate for President selected by a majority of the voters is denied that office by virtue of this ridiculous provision?

Toward 'M.D. Technicians'

To the Editor:

The Association of American Medical Colleges' recently announced changes in the Medical College Admissions Test [news story Nov. 5] will insure the graduation of students who are more technicians than physicians. Future medical-school graduates are now assured that they will be the most uneducated of our educated elite.

Why is there no place for testing the applicant's knowledge of the humanities, the arts, social science, literature and political science?

The announced changes should worry and disturb society at large more than the medical community. Graduates of medicine are apparently to be programmed automatons. Science is to be omnipresent while the art of medicine is allowed (or encouraged) to erode, decay and disappear.

The practice of medicine requires compassion and a balance of both the art and science of medicine. Our medical social ills will not be solved by M.D. technicians. Where are we heading?

Of Agnew and Eagleton

To the Editor:

I resent the election button illustration (Op Ed Oct. 25) bearing the legend "So nobody's perfect/Agnew-Eagleton in '76."

Agnew plea-bargained his way out of jail by resigning the Vice Presidency of the United States. Eagleton is a distinguished and highly respected member of the United States Senate. Coupling their names is like equating a rotten apple with a good orange.

To Save Alaska's Wilderness

To the Editor:

In your Oct. 31 issue Boyce Rensberger reported that conservationists are shifting their energies toward a "drive to protect Alaskan wilderness not affected by the trans-Alaska pipeline." The truth is that no Alaskan wilderness is unaffected by the pipeline. Furthermore, conservationists' efforts to protect Alaska's wilderness through the establishment of huge parks and refuges totaling over 100 million acres are at best stopgap measures to curb the rapid degradation of the "Last Frontier," and at worst shallow and restrictive provisions to set aside the public domain for the enjoyment of a privileged few.

The magnitude and far-reaching effects of the Alaska pipeline are represented by the investment of over $8 billion by multinational oil companies, and an influx of 100,000 people, which has bolstered the population by 33 percent, resulting in a massive importation of outside values, life styles and pressures. In effect, the Alaska pipeline has had the overwhelming impact of igniting an explosive and potentially disastrous boom of petroleum development. No longer does any Alaskan region of significant size remain immune to human penetration and domination. The pipeline haul road has opened the once-remote Brooks Range to a variety of exploitation, increasing the multitude of human demands on the wilderness to far exceed any other point in Alaska's history.

The pipeline is paradigmatic of how big business dictates to government the patterns of growth in which individuals serve as no more than highly paid pawns or appeased petroleum consumers. To effectively combat the forces destroying Alaska's wilderness, real conservationists must adopt more encompassing visions of the world, that incorporate life styles characterized by self-sufficiency, reduced consumption and closer ties to the earth. Ultimately, the only way to protect the wilderness is to discontinue support of those who would impersonally exploit Alaska on a scale such as the trans-Alaska pipeline. Large-scale exploitation is a contradiction to the integrity of the sensitively balanced Alaskan wilderness; big government "protection" of these lands is equally unsuitable.

Those who live on the land, close to the wilderness and intimately acquainted with the harsh realities and joyous wonders of the Northland environment, are the representatives best suited to manage this resource, free from the incongruities of both Washington and the industrial establishment.

What the City Expects of Carter

By Abraham D. Beame

On Nov. 3 when it became clear that Jimmy Carter would be the next President, I was asked whether his election would mean that New York City could now expect to be "bailed out" by the Federal Government.

I made it clear then, as I wish to now, that so long as I am Mayor I will not look to the Federal Government to do for this city what the city must do for itself.

During the last year, New York City has shown the will and the capability to bring its fiscal house into order. We have successfully embarked upon a program of stringent budget reductions, of sound financial practices and of management techniques, that are as advanced as any in the nation.

We have managed, with the cooperation of labor unions, financial institutions and New York State, to set a course toward balancing the city budget in fiscal 1978. It is a commitment I intend to keep regardless of what happens by way of new Federal programs that might emerge from the Carter Administration.

Accepting the fact that the city will do all that is expected of it to manage its affairs efficiently and wisely, there remains a clear obligation on the part of the Federal Government to redress the drain of economic resources, loss of taxing bases, and erosion of employment opportunities that have plagued the center cities of our country.

I am convinced, on the basis of discussions I had with Mr. Carter and his May 25 communication to me on this subject, that the new Administration in Washington will be prepared to endorse a broad spectrum of actions to help our cities.

The President-elect has enunciated approaches to welfare and Medicaid reform that will relieve local governments of their tax-burden share. These functions are truly national in scope and should not be burdening the tax base of this or any other city.

Federal assumption of these costs could relieve our city of $1.1 billion in tax levy costs alone!

We can also look forward to programs that will stimulate development of housing and public works in our cities, and Federal incentives to encourage employment and economic development in urban areas.

In dealing specifically with the fiscal outlook of New York City, Mr. Carter has stated that he plans to meet with Governor Carey and me before his inauguration and work out the principles of a recovery plan that will help assure the solvency of the city and its return to the private investment market.

There are also immediate areas in which the Federal Government, motivated to help, can act administratively to save our city many millions of dollars over the next 12 to 18 months. I have a team of city experts ready to sit down with the new Carter Administration to review each of these areas.

What this will mean to New York City is clear. It may enable us to accelerate our recovery efforts and spell the difference between "making do" and achieving real and measurable growth.

The new Democratic Administration in Washington can be as much help to the city because of its expressed concern as it will be in the development of new and innovative programs.

The $250 million sale of Municipal Assistance Corporation bonds in the public market and the rise of the market price of New York City bonds, both coming right after Mr. Carter's election, are examples of how important the psychology of recovery is to us.

The leadership of the United States Conference of Mayors, which just met in Chicago, articulated this need: The new Administration must express concern for cities—just as President Lyndon B. Johnson pointed to civil rights as a national commitment.

The result of this national urban concern, say the mayors, will be a new national urban investment policy—a cohesive policy that recognizes our cities as centers of civilization and commerce rather than national isolation wards for distasteful social and economic problems.

I also believe President-elect Carter is anxious to see appropriate state and Federal jurisdictions relieve the local tax burden. Welfare, health services, education, courts, correctional facilities—all of these are functions more appropriately the responsibility of state and Federal governments, and we look to these changes as time goes on as progressive signs of equity rather than as any special windfalls for the city.

There is no Federal paradise for New York. The hope of this and other cities rests on an intergovernmental commitment to their survival as economic, social and cultural entities.

New York City has already demonstrated its conviction to survive and its continued willingness to manage its growth and recovery. Given parallel commitments at the national level, our local sacrifices will not have been in vain.

From the Middle

By Alvin P. Sanoff

DAYTON, Ohio. — I am 35. White. Middle-class. A suburbanite. I own two cars and one-fourth of a ranch house. The bank owns the rest.

Most people with my demographics are Republicans. But I am not. I am one of the relatively few registered Democrats in my neighborhood on the outskirts of Dayton. I sometimes feel as though I ought to wear a bell around my neck to warn the neighbors as I pass by.

I don't believe that the pollsters, pundits and prognosticators who have come to regard Dayton as a microcosm of Middle America have ever visited my neighborhood. But they should. For it is probably as typical a Middle-American suburban as any neighborhood can be.

The houses aren't ticky-tacky, but they're not posh. Many ethnic groups are represented. There are Italians and Germans, Russians, Irish and English. But most of the people are two and three generations removed from the old country. Many of them are second-generation suburbanites.

Accountants and engineers, tool-and-die makers and insurance salesmen, lawyers and government employees—all these live in my neighborhood. And all are middle class, with incomes between $15,000 and $30,000.

It is not a wealthy area, although many of the residents hope eventually to attain affluence. But by conventional standards, my neighbors are comfortable. Yet many of them don't feel comfortable. Some have extended their credit to the breaking point and beyond. A few can't even afford to buy furniture to fill up their three- and four-bedroom ranch homes.

My neighbors are climbing the economic ladder. Many are afraid of falling off. They worry about higher taxes and about government programs that will take from them and give to those less well off. They feel that they are just making it now and don't have anything extra to spread around. On Election Day, 73 percent of my neighbors cast their votes for Gerald Ford.

They don't talk much about why they voted as they did. In fact, they don't talk much about politics at all. The conversation runs more to lawns and baseball.

But it doesn't take much insight to understand why my neighbors voted for the candidate who promised less government and lower taxes. They want to keep what they have, and they are fearful of the unknown.

My six-year-old son summed up the prevailing sentiment when I asked him why he had cast his ballot for Mr. Ford in his school's mock election. "If Carter wins," he said, "it'll mean higher taxes." I asked him where he got that idea since he hadn't picked it up at home. "My friends said so," he told me. He's already internalizing neighborhood values.

The fact that my attitudes are different and that I was among the 27 percent in my precinct who voted for Jimmy Carter does not make me any better than my neighbors. It doesn't mean that I am wealthier or enjoy paying taxes. But it may mean that I have a greater concern about the world outside my suburban subdivision. There is a need to look beyond one's neighborhood in defining what is good for the society. Yet, I see people becoming more and more selfish, defining the common good in egocentric terms.

For many of my neighbors, the world stops at suburbia's edge. They spend their lives in isolation from the black and the poor. Many of them work, play and shop in suburbia. Slums and ghettos are outside the realm of their experience.

Maybe it's my urban background—I grew up in the Bronx and Boston—that causes me to look at the world differently than my neighbors do. Or maybe it has to do with my father's Democratic leanings or with my experiences as a journalist.

Whatever the reason, I know that I don't share the political views of most of my neighbors. Many of them have a cramped view of the common good. Persuading them to take a broader view is one of Jimmy Carter's major challenges. I wish him luck.

A Time For the Fire Brigade

By C. L. Sulzberger

ISTANBUL, Turkey — United States-Turkish relationships, damaged by what is regarded here as a pro-Greek bias in Washington produced by a clever pro-Greek lobby, and tinged with violent resentment against the Congressional embargo on arms sales to this country, require swift, effective action by American diplomacy.

We cannot afford to await the results of Turkey's national election eleven months hence—as Turkey had to endure paralysis in our foreign policy during the political campaigning season. If such an artificially imposed pause prevails, it is entirely possible the situation will go from worse to worse and everyone involved will suffer: Turkey, Greece, Cyprus, NATO and the United States.

A tacit agreement is needed between the outgoing Ford Administration and the incoming Carter Administration that the existing east Mediterranean situation should be objectively analyzed immediately by an expert mission whose composition should be agreed to by the President and President-elect.

An obvious man to head such a diplomatic task force is Cyrus Vance, a former Democratic Deputy Defense Secretary and special envoy. He has personal experience of the Greco-Turkish and Cyprus problems and is highly regarded by all principal parties to the dispute. Moreover, since the executive and legislative branches of the American Government have been at odds on these matters, it might be well to include a small, bipartisan Congressional delegation.

I find it hard to imagine that such a diplomatic voyage of discovery would not be welcomed by both Athens and Ankara. There would be no value at this time to including Cyprus on the itinerary. The mission's primary task should be to improve relationships right away among three NATO capitals — Washington, Athens and Ankara. Cyprus is neutral, and while intimately involved, can be dealt with separately and later.

Nor would such a visit find itself intruding on hostile governments. Turkey's Prime Minister Demirel told me recently that the quarrel between Turkey and Greece over the Aegean continental shelf is soluble and "the shelf doesn't belong to either of us; it belongs to both. Negotiations have now begun . . . and this will eliminate confrontation. The same is true of differences on national air space."

Mr. Demirel said of the forthcoming Carter Administration (which the Turkish newspapers deplore): "I'm not worried. The policies of nations shouldn't change with changes in those who administer them. Policies are based on national interests. I think America is a great country and a great people. Yours are a wonderful, nice people. They have kept a true sense of values, of the dignity of man."

Anyone familiar with Greek realities likewise knows that despite emotional outbursts against America in the irresponsible press and extremist, if small, opposition, Prime Minister Caramanlis has a strong parliamentary majority and is personally sympathetic to both the U. S. and NATO. He would like to see the eastern Mediterranean reunited in a firm and friendly defense bond.

A Vance mission could produce much good by a quick, intensive survey and an objective report to leaders and legislators from both American parties in order to bring about more understanding of realities and accord between Ankara and Athens.

Mr. Vance, of course, is among candidates mentioned as a possible Carter Secretary of State. Surely this would in no way diminish his prestige abroad, as chairman of such a mission; nor could its success damage his position should he be invited to succeed Henry Kissinger.

Not only are both major Turkish parties eager to compose arguments with NATO and the U.S. (although they disagree on most other things); so is the majority Greek Government. The other Atlantic allies point out that Turkey can't fulfill its NATO role without the necessary arms.

In fact, if accord can be arranged, the damage so far is not irreparable. United States bases in this country have been "suspended," not closed. American contingents are keeping up installations as caretakers. But if another eleven months are allowed to pass without decisive diplomatic efforts, Turkey may or may not end up with a stronger new Government.

And the position of Mr. Caramanlis in Greece could well be eroded, thus making the situation measurably worse with mass opinion disliking us even more than it now does here. Today is the time to act and President Ford's pledged support of President-elect Carter would seem to imply readiness to go along with such an eminently sensible move.

When it comes to energy, we're in the countdown years.

An electrically powered irrigation system has greatly increased productivity on this farm in northeastern Colorado, near Fort Morgan. These huge sprinklers are now a common sight in the nation's millions of acres of once parched and useless land.

Basin Electric Power Cooperative's new lignite-fired plant near Stanton, N.D., is part of a complex generating power for more than 100 rural electric systems in eight states. Long a leader in mined area reclamation, Basin is also researching productivity levels of reclaimed land.

One of America's newest consumer-owned rural electric cooperatives, Mt. Wheeler Power, Ely, Nev., is wiping away the last great power desert in the West. Mt. Wheeler has strung more than 1000 miles of line to serve a few hundred families in Nevada and Utah.

One of the world's largest dams is Hoover (Boulder) Dam, near Las Vegas, Nev. Hydroelectric projects in the U.S. today meet about one-sixth of the nation's total electric energy needs. Few sites remain which can be developed for hydro projects.

Day by day the earth's supply of oil and natural gas—on which we rely heavily—gets smaller. By the year 2000 most of it will be gone.

It's a frightening countdown. It wouldn't be so bad if we were not an energy-based nation. But we are. Everything that enters into the way we live in America depends on energy—food, shelter, jobs, recreation, everything.

There are several promising possibilities—such as solar and geothermal power—which may provide at least partial answers for the long term.

But for the immediate future we must turn to available alternative sources of energy.

That means nuclear power and coal. We have to concentrate on those areas of development now—before the countdown goes too far.

The National Rural Electric Cooperative Association is the service organization for nearly 1000 electric systems.

Trying to Define the Liberal Arts Program

By EDWARD B. FISKE

Every June the president of Harvard University welcomes graduating seniors to "the company of educated men and women."

There was a time not too long ago when a certain consensus existed about what this meant. Led by Columbia University, a number of colleges established "core curriculums" or "great books" programs in the 1920's and 1930's under the assumption that educated persons shared a certain body of common knowledge. Others established "general education" courses or put together "distribution requirements" based on the premise that a liberal education consisted not only of work in a major field but of exposure to each of the major academic areas: the humanities, the social sciences and the natural sciences.

Since then, however, much has happened. The proliferation of knowledge has called into question the concept of a basic "core" of knowledge. Student demands for more freedom undermined distribution requirements. The recent trend toward "vocationalism" in education has put liberal arts programs of all kinds on the defensive. Two years ago Henry Rosovsky, dean of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard, complained in a letter to his faculty that the president's annual greeting "doesn't mean anything." Being an educated person "may mean that you've designed your own curriculum; it may mean that you know all about urben this or rural that," he said. "But there is no common denominator."

His was not the only complaint. Virtually every major liberal arts faculty in the country has begun a review of its undergraduate curriculum. The most obvious resulting change is the move by many institutions to restore the "distribution requirements" that were wholly or partially eliminated during the 1960's. This shift reflects a new willingness on the part of faculties to exercise academic authority. "We are saying that the institution possesses a degree of knowledge and expertise about the educational process that an 18-year-old should not be expected to have intuitively," said Olin Robison, president of Middlebury College in Vermont.

The major issue, though, is whether it is still possible to define the content of a liberal education, and it is clear that several major approaches are developing. The most traditional is to say that there is a certain "core" of knowledge that on the one hand provides a nucleus of a liberal education and on the other gives students a common reference for discussion and growth in the ability to handle ideas.

Columbia University is one institution that believes in this approach. All entering undergraduates are required to take a two-year "great books" humanities course designed, as Theodore deBary, vice president for academic affairs and provost, put it, "to give them a common fund of learning and conceptual terminology to work with." In addition to distribution requirements, graduates must also take a senior seminar on Western civilization.

The usual criticism of this approach is that the sheer quantity of knowledge today makes the definition of a core unrealistic. Dr. DeBary replies that, in contrast to earlier versions, Columbia's core program does not claim to embrace all available knowledge. "We're saying that there are certain works so central that you won't lose by discussing them. that great themes and philosophy in literature can be discussed in relation to great minds and works, and that you have to define a certain amount of material as central in order to get started."

The other major approach is to recover the spirit of the "general education" movement and begin with the assumption that an educated person is someone who is familiar with the various fundamental ways of analyzing and reflecting upon the world. Harvard took a step in this direction last week when Dean Rosovsky sent some proposals for educational reform to the faculty along with a report from a faculty task force on how these could be translated into a new general education curriculum.

The task force report listed a number of specific areas in which students should have what James Q. Wilson, the chairman, called "informed acquaintance." These ranged from traditional areas like writing and the natural sciences to new ones such as "non-Western civilization and culture."

Yale University has a newly revised general education program along almost identical lines to the one proposed for Harvard. So does the University of Chicago, Princeton has similar requirements, but also demands a thesis. "We believe that planning and carrying out independent study is part of becoming educated," said William G. Bowen, president.

Much, perhaps most, of the new general education programs is quite traditional, but other elements are new. The most obvious innovation is exposure to non-Western cultures. The core curriculums and general education programs of the past were almost always built within the framework of European culture, but there is now general recognition that, as Dean Rosovsky put it, "it is no longer possible to conduct our lives without reference to the wider world."

Mathematics is taking on increased significance in some new curriculums, especially because of its growing importance in the social sciences. "In the 20th Century anyone who is mathematically illiterate is as bad off as someone who can't read," said Steven Muller, president of Johns Hopkins. "It's partly what the computer has done to us. Our society quantifies everything."

Not everyone welcomes these trends. In a dissent from the Harvard task force report Robert V. Pound, a physics professor, challenged the movement to return to more structure. "I doubt very much that the complete emphasis on specialized subjects in the 'Oxbridge' universities has left their students seriously handicapped in later life." he wrote.

Others question whether the Harvard-type model of liberal education is suitable for other types of institutions. Leon Botstein, the president of Bard College in Annandale-on-Hudson, N.Y., for example, said the Harvard model is primarily suitable for a large research university with a highly specialized faculty.

"The small liberal arts college has more flexibility," he said. "And with less of an investment in the curr state of knowledge, we can recruit persons whose i is on teaching." Mr. Botstein said that, instead of organ the liberal arts curriculum around existing disciplines would like to develop one around issues and themes as the relation of man to the environment. "In sci for example, I believe that an educated person shou familiar not only with the methods of science but als history and scope and, perhaps most important today, it gets translated into technology."

Seymour Eskow, the president of Rockland Comm College, raised the issue whether structural chang higher education, such as the growing number of and part-time students who come with work exper are not undermining the traditional concepts of education. "The self-contained campus where you together students and books and great minds to work of learning for an extended period of time is an anachronism," he says.

City College, one of the four-year institutions in th University system, is thinking of modifying its traditional liberal arts program to include a required on "realities of urban America." Robert Marshal president, said that, in defining its goals of liberal tion, the cosmopolitan public institution such as hi must give more attention than some others to issue as "the role of ethnicity" and to bridging the gap be the academic and work worlds.

A Glance Back at Some Major Stories

■ A Critic of Gen. Brown Is Out

A civilian intelligence officer who was stripped of his special security clearances for publicly criticizing the views of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff has resigned from the Air Force. On Oct. 19, in an interview with The New York Times, Joseph Churba criticized Gen. George S. Brown's views that Israel was a military burden on the United States. Mr. Churba said that these views were "dangerously irresponsible." Mr. Churba, who was the Air Force's senior intelligence officer for the Middle East, said that he had been told by his superior that because of the newspaper interview his special clearances had been suspended and that he was no longer of any value to the Air Force as an intelligence estimator.

■ Cadets as Judge and Jury

West Point cadets have voted to assume complete responsibility for the adjudication of suspected honor code violators. The referendum, approved by 85 percent of the 4,000-member corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy, calls for the elimination of the traditional procedure of the review boards of officers. Under the new procedures, Army lawyers will argue before the cadet boards. Jurors will be selected from the corps at large as well as from the honor committee. A 10-to-2 vote will replace the una vote formerly required for a guilty verdict. The refe was the result of three months of study by cadets ficers after the Academy's latest cheating scandal.

Eastern College Football: Has It Caught Up?

Clint Frank, Yale

The New York Times

One View Insists It Is First Class

By NEIL AMDUR

Maybe the time is right: after all, if a Southerner can win the White House, why can't an Eastern college football team be the best?

Like it or not, the East is back as a force in major-college football. Call it a resurgence, a renaissance or simply a comeback. But after years of being teased about their first-class intellectuals and second-class football teams, Eastern schools are proving that x's and o's can be just as relative as $E=mc^2$.

The top 10 national rankings of Pittsburgh and Maryland are not isolated examples. Penn State continues strong, even in a rebuilding year; Boston College beat Texas, 14-13, in its season opener; Rutgers routed Louisville, 34-10, last week; Army trounced Air Force, 24-17, and Navy gave Notre Dame all the Irish could handle several weeks ago before bowing, 27-21.

It is a far cry from the days when student apathy, antiwar protests, racial unrest and talk of athletic deemphasis often overshadowed the final scores at some Eastern games. "I think there's going to be three or

One View Treats Claim as Illusion

By LEONARD KOPPETT

If people think "The East" is coming back in college football, it is fair to ask, back from where, to what, involving whom?

There seemed to be two things wrong with the idea as stated. First: sectionalism in college football is dead: The dividing lines of national power no longer follow conference or regional boundaries, but run horizontally between the 50 or so schools that continue an all-out effort for bowl game rewards and the rest that don't. So to talk of "The East" as an entity is no longer relevant.

Second, if one does want to follow geographic lines, a remarkably small fraction of the district is accounting for whatever share of the national spotlight Eastern teams claim. Of course, there is Penn State. And certainly there is Pittsburgh, which made a conscious effort to upgrade its program a few years ago. And there is Rutgers, with its winning streak. And Maryland.

But when we spoke of "The East" in the past, we meant Army, Navy, Syracuse, a couple of Ivies (often Princeton and Dart-

Yale Beats Harvard, 21-7, and Shares Ivy Crown With Brown, 28-17 Winner

Bruins Rally to Top Columbia Here

By MURRAY CHASS

Brown's determined football team, at first stymied by its own mistakes, rebounded just in time yesterday to reap the rewards of the school's most successful season in 27 years. The Bruins thus gained their first Ivy League championship, though they have to share it, and enjoyed beer instead of soda in the postgame celebration.

With Seth Morris and Billy Hill, a pair of junior running backs, rallying the team, Brown scoped two fourth-quarter touchdowns and defeated Columbia, 28-17, at Baker Field, gaining a tie with Yale for the Ivy crown.

Before John Anderson became the Brown coach four years ago, the Bruins didn't know about championships. They hardly knew about winning seasons, having achieved just one in the previous 14 years.

Anderson said yesterday, after the Bruins had posted their eighth victory in nine games this season, "The seniors on this team were the first group we recruited, and I told them we were going to win a title."

The titeale didn't come easily. The combination of an inspired Columbia team determined to be a spoiler and a variety of Brown mistakes made certain of that. The Bruins lost the ball on a fumble at the Columbia 1-yard line, two of their passes were intercepted, and they drew several costly penalties. They trailed at halftime, 17-7.

"We tried to make it tough on our-

Pagliaro Gains 125 Yards to Pace Elis

By WILLIAM N. WALLACE
Special to The New York Times

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 13—It took the Yale team half the game to prove that it was better han Harvard today, but at the end the Elis had convinced everyone in the congealed crowd of 42,000 at Harvard Stadium. Yale won, 21-7, and thus shared the Ivy League championship with Brown, the only team to beat the Blue this season. That happened back on Sept. 18 in the opening contest and Yale went on to win eight straight games.

The eighth and final victory was slow to develop as Harvard had made the big play of the first half, a 74-yard run with an intercepted pass by Russ Savage, the defensive end. That touchdown, and the conversion kick by Mike Lynch, gave the Crimson a 7-0 lead that stood up until midway through the third uarter. Then the Elis, led by John Pagliaro, turned on their power and put the Crimson away.

Pagliaro, the junior halfback, gained 125 yards in 25 running plays and finally turned the Harvard flanks as Yale did exactly what it intended to do, run over its old adversary.

Pagliaro scored one touchdown and Mike Southworth, the center fullback, the other two as Yale ran for 286 yards and passed for only 30. The Elis, who shifted quarterbacks in the second period, attemped 10 passes and five were complete, two to Yale receivers and thre to Harvard players.

Pitt Overcomes Mistakes, Beats West Virginia, 24-16

By GORDON S. WHITE Jr.
Special to The New York Times

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 13—Pittsburgh found that beink king of the hill is a percarious position but the undefeated and untied Panthers, ranked No. 1 in the nation, overcame their own mistakes and jitters in beating West Virginia, 24-16, today and cleared the way for an all-expenses-paid trip to the bowl of their choice.

Tony Dorsett was the person most responsible for saving Pitt from a shocking reversal by scoring the three Panther touchdowns and rushing for 199 yards. But Dorsett, a senior who is the prime candidate for the Heisman Trophy, lost control of his temper in the final minute of the game and was expelled by the officials for the first time in his varsity career. The expulsion came after both teams spilled out into a melee in front of the Pittsburgh bench at midfield.

Sittings hrough it all and showing concern at times were representatives of the Orange, Sugar and Cotton Bowls. It appears that the Panthers, rated first in the land and owners of a perfect record, can take any of these three bowls they want. The official invitation and acceptance cannot be made until 6 P.M. next Saturday, when Pitt has an open date.

Pitt has one game remaining in the regular season, against Penn State Nov. 26, so the Panthers should still be No. 1 when they make their bowl choice. The Orange and Sugar Bowls appear to have an edge on the Cotton Bowl in Pitt thinking.

Pitt-West Virginia games have always been hard-fought, with touches of too much enthusiasm. West Virginia came into this game today a heavy underdog with nothing to lose, and the Mountaineers hit hard right from the start.

The Panthers, on the other hand, entered the action in the spotlight of the No. 1 ranking, something a Pitt team has not experienced for 39 years. A week of the hoopla of being top-ranked obviously hindered the Panthers.

But Dorsett never wavered in his abilities or made a mistake, though he was hit a bit harder than usual by the West Virginia tacklers. Finally, it angered him, after the outcome was decided. He had scored on runs of 17, 2 and 30 yards.

With 29 seconds to go, Dorsett ran left and was smothered under a gang tackle. He came up fighting, slammed the ball to the ground and swung. That did it.

The field was full of swinging and

Royal Ski Takes Heritage; Wine Treasure Last

By STEVE CADY
Special to The New York Times

CORNWELLS HEIGHTS, Pa., Nov. 13—Favored Royal Ski won the $150,000 Heritage Stakes today at Keystone as Wine Treasure, the unwanted colt added to the field by court order, finished last.

"Who said goalies are crazy?" an impressed eyewitness said after Royal Ski hallied strongly to take the 1 1/16-mile event for 2-year-olds by three-quarters of a length.

The winner is owned by Gerry Cheevers, goalie for the Boston Bruins of the National Hockey League. Cheevers was on hand to accept the trophy earned by his bargain colt, purchased for $20,500 as a yearling in Kentucky. Royal Ski, gaining his fifth victory in eight starts, returned $6.20 as a narrow 2-1 choice in the field of 10.

Earlier in the day, it appeared the Kentucky-bred son of Raja Baba might not get to the post. He cast himself in his stall, unable to get to his feet as he became wedged in a corner, and X-rays were needed to determine that he hadn't suffered an injury. Royal Ski, ridden by Jack Kurtz, ran past pace-setting Prince Andrew in the upper stretch and held off Medieval Man through the final eighth of a mile. Johnny Wingo finished third, 4½ lengths back of the runner-up.

The triumph by Royal Ski, one of three supplementary nominees in the race at fees of $7,500 each, could conceivably nail down an Eclipse Award for him as the season's champion 2-year-old. Yet his strong performance, witnessed by a crowd of 12,993, was overshadowed to some degree by the bizarre circumstances surrounding the eighth running of the Heritage.

What made this Heritage unusual, different from any other horse race ever run, was the presence of Wine Treasure. Until 7:35 P.M. last night, when a Federal judge in Philadelphia ordered Keystone to let Win Treasure into the race, Mrs. Edith Libutti's colt was an unwanted outsider.

But Justice Joseph S. Lord, in granting an 11th-hour restraining order, ruled that the Pennsylvania Horse Racing Commission had deprived 63-year-old Mrs. Libutti of due process last Thursday when it revoked her owner's license without a hearing rather than permit her to enter Wine Treasure in the Heritage.

Mrs. Libutti is the mother of Bob Presti, the horse broker who got into

Ernest Hemingway and the Tough Dodger

By RED BARBER

Ernest Hemingway was a dominant man. He dominated just about everything and everybody he encounteretd. He dominated American literature to the extent many critics rate him our leading writer, although, I'm a William Faulkner man myself.

There are two new books about Hemingway: "How It Was," by his fourth wife, Mary; and, "Papa: A Personal Memoir," by one of his sons, Dr. Gregory H. Hemingway.

So, it is still open season on Hemingway, which I am certain pleases him mightily. He thrived and needed attention as much as Milton Berle requires an audience to laugh at his jokes.

I was around Hemingway casually in 1941 when Larry MacPhail took the Brooklyn Dodgers to Havana, Cuba, for spring training. I was a broadcaster and meant nothing to Hemingway. He was fascinated by all those mighty men of muscles, the ballplayers. He used to leave his finca and hang around the Dodgers in the lobby of the National Hotel. Then he took some of them to shoot pigeons. Several times he had some of them at his finca. One of them he didn't dominate.

The Dodgers in 1947 trained again in Havana. This was when Branch Rickey was breaking the color line in baseball with Jackie Robinson, and to put it mildly, Florida and the Deep South were somewhat hostile.

Hemingway came to a night game in 1947 with Martha Gelhorn, his third wife. They brought the two sons of his second wife, Pauline Pheiffer, with them. After the game a few of us repaired with the Hemingways to his favorite spot, the Floridida. He dominated the evening. His two sons slept outside in his station wagon. One of them, now Dr. Gregory H. Hemingway, is the author of "Papa: A Personal Memoir."

Red Barber, who broadcast Brooklyn Dodger and New York Yankees baseball games, lives in retirement in Tallahassee, Fla.

A Night to Remember

Hemingway was in great good humor all evening. He taught us the pleasing combination of cointreau with cold soda water on the side. He talked, laughed and drank. It was a wonderful experience. Also he had solved the Havana baby-sitter problem.

As I said, however, Hemingway didn't dominate one of the 1941 Dodgers. In fact, he made a sad misjudgment of a relief pitcher named Hugh Casey.

Casey was a big man with a large stomach. He had rosy apple cheeks. He spoke slowly and softly in his Georgia accent. But he had become a killer in a baseball game by strolling in from the bullpen and then coldbloodedly getting opposing batters out. He was a rough man. He was to be a key factor in the pennant won by Brooklyn in 1941. Immediately after the deciding game at Boston, Manager Leo Durocher said, "We couldn't have won it without Casey!"

Casey looked so innocent. Hemingway invited him along with several others, for an evening at the finca.

The next morning Casey was telling me about what happened, and it gave an insight into Hemingway's struggle to be masculine.

"Red," began Casey, "Hemingway got us into his house, and right off he got out a set of boxing gloves. He insisted I put on the gloves and spar with him. I didn't want to box with him. After all, when I was a little younger I'd done some fighting.

"But he wouldn't let me alone. Finally, I put on the gloves, and he said we'd just fool around. Before I knew it he was belting me as hard as he could. I told him to cut it out. He hit me harder than ever.

Casey Getting Battered

"So, I just knocked him down. . and that ended the boxing for the night."

I was a baseball announcer for some 33 years. All that time I kept promising myself the first summer I was out of baseball I would drive west and take a leisurely look at the Rocky Mountains. This came about in 1967. We drove through Ketchum, Idaho. My wife, who knows about such things, said that Hemingway was buried there.

We stood alongside the grave. The day was clear with a warm midmorning brightness. We were alone. I remember thinking then of the deep similarities of the two men: Hemingway and Casey. Hemingway could very well have done a novel on the famous relief pitcher.

Casey, too, was big, was rough physically upon occasion, yet was deeply troubled inside. Casey, too, was always consumed by doubts and fears but managed to keep them hidden except from his roommates. Casey said little, but retired to his room with comic books, cigars and straight whisky. He got in bed, read the comics, smoked the long cigars, and drank the whisky by the water glass—without water.

The big relief pitcher was driving in downtown Brooklyn one night and ran down a blind man. It was an accident, but the blind man was killed, and the inner fires of Hugh Casey burned hotter.

Casey was hauled into court on a paternity charge, and convicted. The inner fires burned higher.

He fell down stairs, hurt his back, and his big league pitching days were suddenly ended. The fires now burned without stopping.

His marriage was always on again, off again. Finally, his wife left him. On the night of July 3, 1951, Casey picked up the telephone and called his estranged wife. If, he said, she didn't come back to him, he would blow his brains out with a shotgun, then and there. She said she wouldn't come back to him. He blew his brains out, then and there. That ended the fire.

Ten years later—minus one day—Hemingway ended his life in the same shotgun fashion. July 2, 1961.

Mal Dixon, Fairleigh Dickinson University's defensive back and kicker

Why a 46-Year-Old Father of 4 Plays College Foot

By MAL DIXON

I can still recall the look of horror on my wife's face when I told her I would be playing football at Fairleigh Dickinson University. Carrie thought I had gone crazy, that I had completely flipped my lid. She didn't speak to me for a week, that's how angry she was.

She was sure her 42-year-old husband would drop dead on the field and that our four kids would be without a father. But I kept coming home from practice in one piece and she began to realize I was in pretty good shape and that I could take care of myself. I knew I would get hurt, things like pulls and sprains, but I was confident enough of my own condition that I would survive.

I did survive, but now it's all over. I can't believe I played my last game yesterday against Stony Brook. I'll be 47 next month, but I don't feel that old. To me, age is a relative thing. There are old 21-year-olds and young 47-year-olds. Right now, I feel like a young 21-year-old.

Mal Dixon lives in Englewood, N.J. He was a restaurant manager from the time he left the Army until he entered Fairleigh Dickinson University.

Throughout my career people have asked me one repetitive question: "Why, Mal, why do you do it?"

"That's simple to answer. I just love sports. I love to compete. I love the challenge of trying to beat my opponent. This has been kind of second childhood for me. When I was a youngster, I had a heart murmur and I couldn't play any athletics from ninth grade until I was in the Army in Germany, where I played football.

When I started, I wasn't looking for publicity. I am proud to be the oldest football player (college or pro) in the country, but that's not why I went into this. I wanted to prove to myself that I could become a solid and productive athlete again and that I could compete over a sustained period. I am proud of the strides I made as a defensive back and as a kicker. Before yesterday's game, I had converted 14 of 15 extra points this season.

But when I look back upon these four years I won't think of statistics, I'll think of the many warm friendships I made among the coaches and my fellow players.

I'll remember the day I went out for the team. The head coach was Mike Picciallo. I asked him if there was an age limit for the team. I thought for sure he was going to tell me I was too old. He said I looked like I was about 26 and that I shouldn't have any trouble. When the coach found out I was about 43, he almost fell down a flight of steps.

I'll remember how I gradually gained acceptance with the other players. During the first weeks, they were afraid to hit me. They thought I was a relic. One day I took a hard hit in practice and the player, Greg Shishko, immediately reached down to try to help me up. He said, "I hope I didn't hurt you, Mr. Dixon."

But the kids saw I could take it, and instead of Mal Dixon, old-man player, I just became Mal Dixon, player. I was just one of the boys.

I'll remember the off-the-field relationships with the guys. I am one of the few players to have made it through four years, and this fall I tried to exert some leadership on the team. I instituted an Adopted Player of the Week Award. I bought a big cake for the player who made the most mistakes in the game before, trying to spur him on to better things in the next game. Everyone got a kick out of it and the guys all wanted to be my adopted son for a day.

Superiority of Golf Over Tennis

By TODD LOGAN

Tennis was not always such a popular sport. In the 1950's, things were different.

Eighteen summers ago, my father was playing in the final of the Northmoor Country Club tennis championship. Noted for his deft spin shots and accurate lobs, he was serving a second ball, leading the match, 6-2, 4-1. As his body coiled to unleash his twist serve, he gasped and fell face first inside the baseline.

"Foot fault!" bellowed the linesman.

"Double fault, love 15," added the unpire. Dad lay unconscious on the red clay court.

"Don't touch him. Nobody move that man," warned a voice from the rear. "Please, let me get through. Step aside, the ball is still in play," said the man waving a spear with a green pennant on the end.

Todd Logan is a freelance writer who lives in Concord, Mass. This story is part of a book he is writing on tennis.

"What ball?"

"There," he said, pointing to a barely visible golf ball lodged between my father's shoulder blades.

"Sloan hooked his tee shot, catching him squarely in the back," he continued. "Now please move back. We have a golf championship to finish."

Seconds later, Everett Sloan, Northmoor's defending golf champion, strutted across the court, leaving a trail of cleat marks in the red clay.

"I'll Just Be a Moment"

"Bloody rotten luck, old chap," Sloan said as he bent over my motionless father. "I say, bloody rotten luck, old chap," he repeated.

"He's unconsicious, Ev," offered a voice from the gallery.

"Oh, sorry, old man, I'll just be a moment," said Sloan.

Acting in accordance with the rules, Sloan removed the golf ball from Dad's back and dropped it 6 feet, or two club lengths, away. The gallery of more than 200 Northmoor golfers quietly lined the court's edge, eagerly awaiting the legendary Sloan's play.

After four practice swings, Sloan approached the ball. His arms tensed as he began his backswing.

Suddenly, my heretofore unconscious father groaned loudly and rose to his knees, staring directly into Sloan's backswing.

In the Name of the Queen . . .

"For her majesty's sake, stay down and be quiet;" Sloan admonished.

"Shh . . ." quickly followed from the gallery. In a state of shock, Dad groggily acquiesced.

Unperturbed, Sloan followed through with a perfect backswing. His drive sailed over the cyclone fence, landing inches from the 14 pin. The gallery exploded wth cheers as a jubilant Everett Sloan returned to the golf course.

Fortunately, my father suffered only a bruise. The size of a golf ball.

Mailbox: The Nets' Empty Seats

To the Sports Editor

The New York Nets, winning a league championship with the most exciting basketball player in the country and operating in an area of several million population, failed to attract an average of no more than 7,500 (Net's figures) per game last season. The Coliseum's capacity is almost 16,000. So it's silly to claim, as Dave Anderson did, that "Roy Boe has a responsibility to the Nets' community."

The question really is, "Why don't the fans support the Nets?" The answer may be in the ridiculous prices for tickets. They are scaled at $2.50 to $8.50, and while this does not faze a few thousand ticket holders who buy season tickets, it does not fill the arena.

The future of basketball in Long Island and elsewhere is with the teenagers. They can get up the bread to see an occasional rock concert, but they can't do that often enough to support the Nets on a game-to-game basis.

Back in the 1930's, Tim Mara let high school students into the football Giants' games at the Polo Grounds with 40 cents and a G.O. card. He was building fans, and you know how well he succeeded. It wouldn't harm Roy Boe to do the same thing. It's better than empty seats.

But basically, the whole situation stems from the astronomical salaries being paid athletes. Sure, everything is inflated today, but a market price is based on supply and demand, and if the tickets are priced too high and Julius Erving and his colleagues are not filling the arena, neither the tickets nor Erving are worth the price.

When owners come to their senses and realize their practices are driving them into bankruptcy, and the athletes realize that when leagues and teams fold many of them are out of jobs, the salaries will become more realistic, the ticket prices will be within reach of the fans and the coliseums all over the country will be filled. Economics, not loyalty to the fans, will be the determining factor.

Loyalty Goes to Boe, Not to a Greedy 'Doctor'

To the Sports Editor:

It seems to me that those allegedly loyal Nets basketball fans who have been berating Roy Boe for the sale of Julius Erving to the Philadelphia 76ers are about as loyal to the Nets as was their great hero the "Doctor," who absolutely refused to honor the remaining four years of a seven-year contract that he had signed three years ago. Those lamentations about being used and abused, and "forced" to leave New York and his beloved Nets fans, are the most ridiculous things since nonskid hockey pucks and invisible tennis balls.

So I would like to suggest that those alleged loyal Nets fans "go slow on Boe" and quit serving the likes of Erving. For if anyone belongs in the public "stocks" these days, it is some of these avaricious athletes and their agents, who seem to feel that a signed contract must only be binding upon the owners and that they are never bound to honor it.

In this sense, it is also unfortunate that our judiciary system has, in some instances, actually lent support to the rupture of contractual honor within professional sports, to such an extent that it gives one pause to wonder what-ever has happened to those

How to Dispel Qualms About Hitting Overhead

By SHEPHERD CAMPBELL

Do you get premonitions of disaster when a tennis opponent sends up a lob? Does the thought of the overhead smash you'll have to hit give you the screaming meemies?

If it does, you're in good company because lots of players—even some of the best—feel just as squeamish about what is undoubtedly the most difficult shot in tennis. As Fred Perry, the great British star of the 1930's, notes: "The overhead calls for more intense concentration, far greater precision in timing and better positioning than any other stroke in the game."

But if you hope to develop an effective game, you've got to conquer your qualms about the overhead. Otherwise, opponents will lob you into submission when you go to the net.

Despite your fears, the overhead can be mastered. The key, Perry says, is to "use your basic service action as the foundation for your smashing stroke." In other words, think of the overhead simply as a serve that's hit in the forecourt.

Once you see that your opponent is about to lob, turn sideways to the net and skip backward as speedily as possible with short, overlapping steps. Try to let the ball bounce before you hit it; you can take it on the fly later, after you've gained proficiency and confidence in the shot.

The trick is to try to hit the overhead from about the same position as you hit the serve—that is, above the right shoulder and slightly in front of you if you're right-handed. Your opponent isn't going to be cooperative enough to put the ball at that spot, so you must shuffle around to position yourself.

But while the overhead motion resembles that of the serve, the backswing should be shorter. The reason is that the lob is descending from a greater height and, therefore, more precision is needed in timing the shot. So instead of using a large circular wind-up, just let the racquet head drop behind your shoulder into the "back-scratching" position. Then bring it forward as when you serve.

Make sure to propel the racquet head through the ball. Failure to do that is one of the most common sources of error on the overhead. If you try to picture throwing the racquet over the net, that should help overcome the problem.

It should also help give you the proper full follow-through, which again should be similar to the serve.

It takes time and practice to develop a solid overhead. The shot has to be worked on to be perfected. Yet how often do you see club players practicing it? They have time to work on ground strokes, serves and volleys. But the overhead? Oh, no. That's too much trouble.

It shouldn't be. As Perry says: "There is probably no greater satisfaction in tennis than taking a full-blooded crack at an overhead and putting it away for a resounding winner."

Shepherd Campbell is editor of Tennis magazine.

Argentina Ousts Ecuador

BUENOS AIRES, Nov. 13 (UPI)—Argentina won its quarterfinal series in the South American zone of the Davis Cup competition today when Ricardo Cano and Jose Luis Clerc defeated Ecuador's Ricardo Ycaza and Colon Nunez, 6-3, 3-6, 8-6, 6-2.

The Argentines thus took an unbeatable 3-0 lead and will face the winner of the Brazil-Bolivia series.

The Only Way to Travel

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 13—Every now and then along the Canadian Pacific right-of-way, a jackrabbit would take off in flight, racing flat out toward the rim of the Alberta plain and throwing in an exuberant leap every few steps like a small boy released from school. In the rugged Northwest, where every Mountie always gets his man, the rabbit is no furry little Easter bunny with a soft white coat and pink eyes. These jacks looked as big as collies, and if you turned them loose at a dog track they would chase the greyhounds.

Sports of The Times

It was something special to be riding along gazing out the window relishing the changing character of the country. This is how it used to be before railroads in the United States discovered that hauling hogs had it all over hauling people. Fortunately, the C.P.R. still prides itself on hauling people in comfort and on time. Traveling from New York to San Francisco, you save neither time nor money going by way of Toronto, Sudbury, Moose Jaw, Medicine Hat, Calgary, Banff and Vancouver, but it is the happy route.

Somewhere west of Medicine Hat, where the dammed waters of the Bow River make a broad lake, hundreds of Canada geese made rafts on the surface. Magpies were in flight everywhere, gaudy showoffs in black and white with longer tails than any bird needs.

From transcontinental trains of a decade or so ago it was often possible to see herds of antelope on the Wyoming plains. No such creatures were spotted on this trip, though at one point a dozen quail ambled through wheat stubble, indifferent to the passing cars.

Through Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta the limitless prairies stretch to the sky, then all of a sudden, a half-hour west of Calgary, the tan billiard table explodes into the Canadian Rockies.

Horned Pedestrians

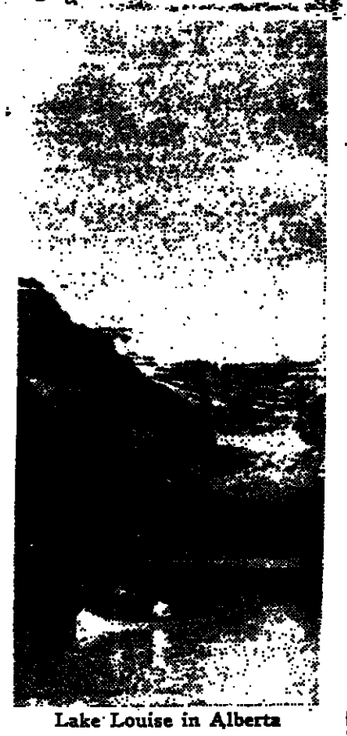
In Banff the hotel reception clerk said the ski season had started in November last year but probably wouldn't get off the ground this winter before December, maybe Christmas. There was only a dusting of snow on the mighty peaks that surround Banff, though of course the glacier that overlooks Lake Louise was a great thick layer of meringue.

On the Trans-Canada Highway between Banff and Lake Louise, a sign reads: "Wildlife. No stopping in the next three miles." Not far beyond that, a Rocky Mountain bighorn sheep idled on the shoulder of the road. A few yards away its spouse stand motionless on a boulder, posing for a calendar.

Though stopping to gawk is verboten, there is no law against slowing down to avoid a collision with one of these natives. This is the time of year for extra caution on the highways, for it is the mating season for some animals like deer. During the mating season many animals, including man, tend to be unwary.

In 1975, according to a piece in the paper, cars and trucks killed 902 deer in Ontario, and in a normal year, 250 to 300 are hit in the vicinity of Toronto and Hamilton, big cities. In the West, where wildlife is more abundant and traffic moves at high speed on superhighways, the figures are far greater.

Up to a few years ago the turkey buzzard was virtually unknown on the Western slopes of the Continental Divide. Now these vultures are almost always visible in the summer skies of western Montana. Almost surely, it is the abundance of carrion created by the high-speed highways that has lured them over the hump.



Lake Louise in Alberta

And No Telephones

The car left the main highway and climbed toward Lake Louise. Around a curve, something was spotted moving in the weeds beside the road. It was too big for a bobcat, too small for a deer or elk, probably not a lynx. Then it was close up and easily recognizable—a copote.

That completed the day's exercise in nature study, except for one dead red squirrel on the road and many live magpies in the air. The westward journey was resumed by train. Beyond the Divide, snow was deeper, with frescoes of animal tracks, large and small. In the fading light of late afternoon, the fir forests, mantled in white, made extravagant Christmas cards.

In the morning, fog lay thick on the outskirts of Vancouver. There was water on the right with rafts of logs bound for pulp or planing mills. Pigeons perched on rooftops, gulls rode the swells and wild duck by scores and hundreds took off and landed. On a tree-lined avenue toward the airport, the taxi driver said: "This used to be a logging road. A stagecoach traveled over it once a day in each direction. One day a tree fell and killed the driver. It didn't hurt the horses or the passengers, just the driver whose number was up."

"I'm writing a book about Vancouver," the driver said, "and I've gathered lots of stories like that."

Approaching the airport, he pointed out a blue heron standing in a field that used to be, he said, part of a big farm. Then there was a second heron and a third. Then the plane for San Francisco, and journey's end. In three days on the train, the telephone hadn't rung once.

Theismann Faces Giants Here Today

Ara Parseghian, the Notre Dame coach, assembled his freshman hopefuls. High school stars from Pennsylvania and Ohio wondered whether high school stars from Michigan and New Jersey would turn out to be better football players.

"I want running backs over here, offensive linemen over there," said Parseghian, as he broke down the large group into smaller units.

A 5-foot-10-inch, 150-pound kid from South River, N. J., headed for the section of the field Parseghian had picked out for quarterbacks. He figured there'd be two or three other guys there. He was shocked when he saw 10. Just by looking at his competitors, the kid from South River knew most were bigger, stronger and probably faster. The kid never worried.

As a sophomore, Joe Theismann was Notre Dame's starting quarterback, as a senior he was an all-American. Today, the kid from South River, now 27 years old, 6 feet tall and 184 pounds, returns to New Jersey as the starting quarterback for the Washington Redskins against what's left of the Giants.

Theismann earned his start over Billy Kilmer by completing 20 of 32 passes last Sunday for 302 yards and three touchdowns against the San Francisco 49ers. It was a game the Redskins had to win and they won it, 24-21, as Theismann ran 8 yards for a first down on a faked field-goal attempt that helped set up the winning field goal much closer.

Hard Work Plus Patience

He earned his start because the Redskins, with a 6-3 won-lost record and a shot at a National Football League playoff berth, have an offensive line that makes mobility a requisite for quarterbacks and Kilmer, at 37, isn't as mobile as he used to be.

Giants Stadium in East Rutherford is about 40 miles from South River, where Theismann's father, after days pumping gas, spent long hours throwing footballs with his son. And when father was too busy, mother was usually available for football practice.

"I even made my grandmother, who spoke nothing but Hungarian, practice with me one day," Theismann said over the phone. "She laughed when I asked her, but I told her, 'C'mon, I'll teach you.'"

Theismann was taught early that hard work was the way to success. The Notre Dame freshman of nine years ago never doubted he'd succeed. "I had me going for me," he said. "I wanted it and I wanted it bad. There isn't a sacrifice too big that I won't make. If somebody spends six hours practicing, I'll spend seven. If he spends 18 hours, I'll spend 19."

He spent three years as the highest-paid player in the Canadian Football League before signing a National Football League contract with the Redskins three seasons ago. Then he waited two years for Sonny Jurgensen and Kilmer to act their ages. "Patience is a virtue," he said, "but little did I know how virtuous I had to be."

Patience is one of the few virtues the Giants have left. They are 0-9, on the longest losing streak in their 52-year history and haven't scored a touchdown in 14 quarters. And five regulars from the offensive machine are doubtful starters for the 1:05 P.M. game. They are Craig Morton (quarterback with a swollen elbow), Doug Kotar (halfback with leg injury), Jimmy Robinson (wide receiver with groin pull), Tom Mullen (left tackle with sprained ankle) and Karl Chandler (center with bad back).

Allen Has Giants' Number

History may not be on the Giants' side, but the law of averages is. The Giants have lost 11 straight games to Washington since 1970, including the last-minute 19-17 decision in the opener nine weeks ago, and have not beaten Coach George Allen in 14 attempts, including three when he was with the Los Angeles Rams.

But the Redskins cannot take the Giants at face value. This is one of the most intense of all pro football rivalries. "We're concerned," Theismann said. "They geared their whole preseason to play us and they're at a point now where they're about to start a second season."

So the kid from South River keeps working. And his family keeps helping. When he returns from Redskin practice to his home in the Virginia suburbs, his 5-year-old son, Joey, often greets him with a football. "He evidently doesn't think I practice enough," Theismann said.

Jets, in Unfamiliar Role, Favorites Today Over Bu

By GERALD ESKENAZI

At last, the Jets have a must game. This one isn't for the bragging rights to New York, or to prove the American Football League is as strong as the National.

"We've had a built-in excuse all year," admits oCach Lou Holtz. "When something went wrong we'd say 'this happened.' Or we'd moan 'that happened.' I don't want that now."

He senses a victory. So, in fact, do the bookmakers wh have made the eJts a whopping 7-point favorite ti hand the expansionist Tampa Bay Buccaneers a 10th straight loss.

"This is the first time we've been favored, said Holtz, "and teams act different when they're favorites."

But how different, and is it positive or negative? This game draws together a New York team that averages 8.4 points a game against a visitor that explodes for 9.8 points a game.

Despite the prospect of a game in which a first down could be the most excitement in a quarter, almost 60,000 seats have been sold fo rthe 1 P.M. kickoff at Shea Stadium. About 2,000 seats will be on sale at the ticket windows, too. There is no local television, but the game will be heard over WOR radio.

Coach John McKay has built one of the youngest teams in sports in the Bucs, whose average age is 24.6 years and whose average experience is 2.9 years.

The players are so young that their mistakes and enthusiasm have accounted for this odd statistic: For every 19 yards they move forward, penalties set them back 7 yards.

They have been on a virtual treadmill in their first season. Their defense, for a new club, has held up better than the Jets'. But they rank last in overall offense, offsetting their ninth-place ranking on defense in the A.F.C.

Namath Doesn't Complain

Richard Todd will be in the starting quarterback for the Jets for the third straight game. Suddenly, it is comfortable for the Jets to call him their quarterback.

Even Todd is warming to his job, not looking at it as a usurper of the title that Joe Namath has held since 1965: Quarterback, New York Jets.

"People don't realize how is making this for us," says a of the Jets' front office. "Ot terbacks might complain, hasn't."

Namath's chronically sore, right knee has responded s treatment this season. Rat being defensive about yiel starting assignment, Namath iterated, "I do what the co me to."

And if the Jets find themsel ing sometime today, and Toc effective, Namath may take wearing that creaky bra squeaks. Namath is still tro the knee, but can play if he mu

…bably the only contract … that does. But because …ntract, Red Auerbach accepted Dave Cowens's decision without a scene.

"Red told him," Richard Gold says, "that Dave Cowens perking at 60 percent is still pretty good, but Dave said, 'That wouldn't satisfy me.'"

Red Auerbach knew enough not to argue too strenuously. "We could see right away in his first training camp," the Celtics's president, general manager, former coach and most celebrated cigar smoker once said, "that nobody was going to tell this kid he could not do something if he wanted to do it." And wisely, Red Auerbach was not about to tell Dave Cowens he could not take a leave of absence. Red Auerbach might have snarled and screamed at another player, but not at Dave Cowens.

The other Celtics also accepted Dave Cowens's decision without any apparent rancor.

"I guess Dave thought his personal game was not up to what it should be," Jo Jo White said. "That he couldn't give what he wanted to give. He's such a competitor, that would bother him."

Cowens was averaging 18 points and 15 rebounds, but the Celtics had a 4-4 won-lost record.

When an athlete takes an unblessed leave of absence, as Dick Allen has done in baseball, management and his teammates usually accuse him of betraying the team. But no nasty words about Cowens have surfaced yet. Perhaps that's because they understand that he's different. "I don't think of myself as a superstar," he has said of his decision. "I'm just a normal guy who quit his job." His teammates know that he didn't do it as a ploy to renegotiate his contract or to force a trade.

"I started out as a Celtic," he told a friend not long ago, "and I want to finish as a Celtic."

He also canceled a lucrative endorsement following the Wednesday announcement of his leave of absence.

"He told me," Richard Gold says, "it would not be right to talk about basketball when he wasn't playing."

The Celtic Changes

Dave Cowens reportedly is in excellent health despite the loss of 15 pounds during a hectic summer of operating his four basketball camps. But his lack of self-motivation probably has been influenced, at least subconsciously, by changes in the Celtics—the trade of Paul Silas to the Denver Nuggets after an angry holdout, the retirement of Don Nelson, the adjustment to Sidney Wicks and Curtis Rowe as forwards. Nelson was his pal on road trips and Silas was the ultimate rebounder.

"Paul gives me the chance to freelance more," Cowens once said. "He makes it easier for me to play the kind of game I like to play."

Dave Cowens is understood to have told Red Auerbach to "give Silas what he wants," a $350,000 contract. He also is understood to be disenchanted with Tom Heinsohn, the Celtics' coach. But the Celtics and Cowens and everybody else involved insist that there are no personality conflicts behind his decision.

"He's too much of a pro," Richard Gold says, "to be influenced by pettiness."

In his style of living that reflects his country boyhood in Kentucky, he hasn't needed much money. But now that he's not on the payroll, perhaps money will spark his motivation to return. And now that he's not playing basketball, perhaps he'll miss it. Most athletes do. He'll be back, probably soon enough to help the Celtics try to repeat as champions; without him, they won't. But he always plays down his contribution.

"I feel less talented," Dave Cowens has often said, "than a lot of guys I play against."

But he's forgetting that intensity is a talent that the guys he plays against do not have.

Ram Quarterback, Cards' Injuries Big Factors in Their Game Today

The important game in the National Football League today is in Los Angeles, matching the St. Louis Cardinals and the Rams. A defeat for either side will damage the drive to the postseason playoffs and both are in a precarious position as to personnel.

About Pro Football

The Rams are switching quarterbacks, Pat Haden for James Harris, and when a contending team does that in the 10th week of the season the move hardly reflects confidence.

Chuck Knox, the coach, protected Harris like a mother hen for three seasons before caving in. Knox went down fighting, saying that the move in no way reflected on the ability of Harris but that Haden deserved the chance "to show what he can do."

The Cardinals will be without Mel Gray, the wide receiver who has made so many big plays. He is recovering from surgery to repair a broken nose.

Gray is one of the few who can change an opponent's defensive plan. Terry Metcalf, the Cardinals' other big-play maker, is easier to cover on pass plays when Gray has not pulled half the defensive secondary 30 yards down the field.

This game, however, will be won on the scrimmage like so many others. So the focus will be on the Cardinals' offensive line, rated the best in the league when blocking for the runners Metcalf or Jim Otis, or protecting the passer, Jim Hart.

Offensive linemen have been characterized as meek and methodical compared to the brawling types who play the defensive line.

Jim Hanifan, the offensive line coach, believes his charges are exceptions to the generality. He has brawlers in Dan Dierdorf, Conrad Dobler, Roger Finnie, Bob Young and Tom Banks. Dierdorf is the best. He says: "We're aggressive. We like to play rough and tumble."

Associated Press

James Harris

Hanifan's impressions are these:

Dierdorf (6-3, 280)—"Powerful, exceptional balance and agility, intelligent mean streak. He asks no quarter and gives none."

Banks (6-2, 245)—"The quickest."

Young (6-1, 270)—"More conservative and quieter than the others. He can bench press 500 pounds."

Finnie (6-3, 250)—"Roger's strength is his footwork. He reminds me of a boxer or a quarterhorse."

The unexpected is the expected in this sport. So Gordon Blankenship should not have been surprised (he said he was) when the phone rang 12 days ago as he was about to go to class in Hayward, Calif. A physical education major at California State, he was to attend class in a course called "Athletes in the Ancient World."

But the Pittsburgh Steelers were calling and three hours later Blankenship, a 208-pound linebacker, was flying East to join the defending Super Bowl champions.

With Gordon Gravelle, the offensive tackle, out for the season, the Steelers had an opening and Blankenship was their first choice as a roster addition. He had been drafted last winter by the Oakland Raiders and cut by them four games into the season.

How did the Steelers know about him? From reviewing the Raiders' exhibition game films prior to their opening game against Oakland. His job was to fill a place on the special kick teams.

All games on Wednesday are toward qualification for the final round in Argentina in 1978. More than 100 countries are participating in qualifying matches round the world. Sixteen will make it to Argentina, which has automatically qualified as the host country. West Germany will also be there as the defending champion.

If Canada and the United States haven't decided by today on when to stage their playoff game in the World Cup preliminaries, the International Federation, the world governing body of soccer and organizer of the World Cup, will make the decision. The Americans would like to have a home-and-away series, but the Canadians have apparently objected for financial reasons. The meeting the Canadians had set for last Wednesday to discuss their financial problems has been postponed.

The Canadians, who had contract problems with their players, reportedly need $50,000 to finance the team for a playoff game. The Americans, who resolved a contract dispute last summer, have been in Haiti for a week to prepare for the match. They will meet Haiti's national team today in an exhibition.

The United States-Canada playoff resulted after the countries finished tied in a qualifying group, which also included Mexico.

Pistons Rout Knicks, 111-97; 30 for Lanier

By PARTON KEESE

Special to The New York Times

DETROIT, Nov. 12—Bob Lanier, the Detroit Pistons' big man, was hurting. He complained of tendinitis in the knees, a grievously sore back, a painful left elbow and assorted aches and pains.

No one, including the Knicks, fell for that tonight, as the 6-foot-11-inch, 255-pound center still led both clubs with 30 points and 14 rebounds in pacing Detroit to a convincing 111-97 victory over New York at Cobo Arena.

The Knicks had their own medical problem. They had taken a 10-point lead at the start of the second half when Earl Monroe waved to Coach Red Holzman to take him out. His left hip, which a Piston banged in the first quarter, had become too painful, so the Knick guard left the game, for good as it turned out.

Without Monroe, the Knicks suddenly were no match for the running Pistons. Behind Lanier, Kevin Porter's season-high of 22 points and Ralph Simpson's steady 18, the Pistons built a third-quarter lead they never relinquished.

The Pistons' physician called Monroe's injury a "hip pointer," or a bruise on the hip bone. The doctor said Monroe was doubtful for tomorrow night's game against Milwaukee at Madison Square Garden.

"That was the key to our defeat," said Holzman, "taking nothing away from Lanier—he's too powerful—or the rest of the Pistons, who all seem to be good. When Earl got out of there, we had no one to replace him who can do the things Earl can do in such situations. They just ran away from us."

While he was in there, Earl the Pearl had the answer to Kevin Porter's jitterbug dribbling show. Not that he could halt the sensational Piston guard from scoring off his razzle-dazzle, but when Monroe turned on his own fancy-dan act, it seemed to cool the hot, young Porter.

Shelton in Foul Trouble

Monroe had 16 points for his 18 minutes, 6 of those coming in the first two minutes of the second half, so you knew he was coming on, as were the Knicks. Unfortunately, these days, depth is not a Knick strong point.

With the Pearl gone and Lonnie Shelton, their brilliant rookie forward, in foul trouble, the Knicks almost appeared to be standing back to watch the Pistons score 14 straight points. The splurge made the 6,956 fans sound like 60,956 in cozy Cobo.

For one half, Shelton, at 6-8 and 245, had been able to outrebound Lanier and Leon Douglas, the 6-10 rookie addition to Detroit's tremendous front line, which includes 6-8 Howard Porter. Shelton had 11 rebounds at the half, compared to Lanier's five and Douglas's five.

However, with Shelton having to sit out much of the second half, the Pistons' awesome threesome racked up a total of 37 rebounds to 13 for Shelton and six each for Jim McMillian and John Gianelli of the Knicks.

Holzman had one more problem, a nonfunctioning scoreboard. Constantly asking the score, the time, the number of fouls, as well as worrying about Monroe's hip and Shelton's fouls, the Knick coach seemed more harried than usual.

Red Doesn't Know Score

"I don't like to play without a scoreboard," Red said. "I just can't tell what's going on as well."

From a more positive viewpoint, Coach Herb Brown of the Pistons thought the difference in the outcome came when his team "made a few adjustments" at halftime.

"We didn't play well the first half at all," Brown asserted. "So we began helping each other out, pressing more, overguarding them—and running. Lanier was his usual terrific self [the last six games he has averaged more than 31 points and shot 63 percent], but the Porters, Kevin and Howard, were super. We all chipped in when it counted, and that's what did it."

Lakers 117, Pacers 106

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 12 (AP)—Kareem Abdul-Jabbar scored 34 points to lead the Los Angles Lakers to a 117-106 victory over the Indiana Pacers tonight. The Lakers had to hold off a fourth-quarter rush by the Pacers, who got as close as 5 points. 107-102, with three minutes remaining. At that point, a rookie forward, Earl Tatum, scored 6 points to lead a 10-2 aker blitz, putting the game out of reach.

The Lakers' Lucius Allen had 28 points, 22 in the first half. The Pacers were led by Billy Knight, with 29 points, 13 in the third period.

Sonics 102, Kings 97

SEATTLE, Nov. 12 (AP)—Fred Brown poured in a season-high 33 points, including 8 late in the final period, as the Seattle SuperSonics posted a 102-97 victory over the Kansas City Kings tonight. It was Seattle's 22d consecutive regular-season triumph at the Seattle Coliseum over two seasons.

The Kings, who trailed by 74-64 after three periods, closed to within 93-89 with 2:47 to play. But the Sonics, behind Brown's 6 points, rallied for a 99-91 margin with 1:22 left.

Barons' Late Goal Ties Flames, 3-3

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

ATLANTA, Nov. 12 (AP) — Rick Hampton, a defenseman, scored a third-period goal on a power play and gained the Cleveland Barons a 3-3 tie with the Atlanta Flames tonight in a National Hockey League game.

The Barons scored once in each period to earn the tie, with Hampton firing a 15-foot shot from the edge of the right faceoff circle at 13 minutes 44 seconds of the third period.

Atlanta scored first in the opening period when Ken Houston, right wing, scored on a rebound from just outside the left faceoff circle. Dennis Maruk of Cleveland scored 21 seconds later on a back-hander that tied the game.

In the second period Cleveland went ahead on Wayne Merrick's pass from Gary Sabourin at 4:59. Only 15 seconds later Hilliard Graves scored on a short shot from in front of the net and lifted the Flames to a 2-2 tie.

Atlanta's final goal came later in the second period when Willie Plett, a rookie, scored his first N.H.L. goal on a 20-foot shot into the upper corner of the net that put the Flames ahead, 3-2.

Black Hawks 5, Capitals 4

LANDOVER, Md., Nov. 12 (AP)—The times in the second period tonight, twice on short-handed goals by Jim Harrison and Pit Martin; and defeated the Washington Capitals, 5-4.

The defeat snapped a club-record three-game winning streak for the Caps, who until the current string had never won two in a row during their three seasons of existence.

Dick Redmond's second power-play goal, following the third penalty of the game against Gordon Smith of the Caps, launched Chicago's comeback after Washington had gone ahead on first period goals by Guy Charron, Mike Lampman and Hartland Monahan.

Rangers Lose, 6-2; Tie Mark

that a system? I just call it checking."

The Sabres, who last season were a high-scoring, defensively-weak team like the Rangers, are playing much more conservatively this season, waiting for openings while protecting their net. As a result they had lost just one game in their last eight before facing New York.

Buffalo played cautiously in the first period. Jim Lorentz scored on a power play matching Phil Esposito's opening Ranger goal. The Ranger captain scored on a shot from the slot on a backhanded pass from Bill Goldsworthy, the new wing acquired Thursday from Minnesota.

But in the second period the openings in the Ranger end materialized and the Sabres scored two goals early in the session. Then they killed off three consecutive Ranger power plays and added another goal to make the score 4-1. The Sabre goals came from the team's hard-working, lesser-known forwards rather than the fleet members of the disconnected "French Connection." The three scorers were Craig Ramsay, Andre Savard and Don Luce.

Ramsay had scored by taking a sharp cross-ice pass from Rene Robert, slipping ahead of Ken Hodge down the left side and sweeping in behind Dave Farrish, the rookie defenseman. He shot the puck between Gilles Gratton's legs. The Rangers allowed Buffalo to move in again just 14 seconds later. A soft shot by Savard who was alone in the slot was swept away by Gratton but the puck jumped.in of the goalie's pads.

McEwen Nets for Rangers

Mike McEwen, a rookie defenseman, finally scored for New York deflecting in a shot by Carol Vadnais at 1:23 of the final period on a power play. McEwen, who has remarkable powers of acceleration and recovery plus a large measure of drive, engineered many of th Rangers' plays. Still he would back in time to protect his side of the Ranger zone. He was not on ice for any of Buffalo's goals in the first two periods.

Terry Martin, a Buffalo rookie, stopped a slapshot by his teammate Bill Hajt, sticked handled the puck in front of Grattan, and scored Buffalo's second power play goal of the game. It was Martin's first goal in the National Hockey League and gave Buffalo a 5-2 led.

The Rangers had the momentum and the shots in the final period but the goaltending of Desjardins was superb. In one sequence he stopped a three rebound shots.

With the score 3-1 for Buffalo, the Rangers, whic hhas scored more powerplay gpals than any other team in the league, got three opportunities. But the Buffalo penalty-killers were superb. Luce and Ramsay head the team and between their work and that of the forwards who spell them Buffalo had foiled all but one of it's opponents last 41 powerplay attempts and has the best penalty killing in the league.

A L.I. Youth Stars in Goal For the Boston College S...

By ARTHUR C. KAMINSKY

Goaltenders are the center of attention on almost any hockey team. If a gamble is hot, his acrobatics will catch a fan's eyes quicker than goal scorers or bone-crunching blue-liners.

And it is a constant source of satisfaction to the followers of collegiate hockey that some of the most successful goalies on the professional level received training in college. Both of last season's all-star goalies in the National Hockey League are former collegians — Montreal's Ken Dryden (Cornell) and the Islanders' Glenn Resch (Minnesota-Duluth). In all, about 30 percent of all N.H.L. goalies are former college stars.

And there are more on the way, with perhaps the brightest prospect of all a local product, Boston College's Paul Skidmore, who is from Smithtown, L. I.

Skidmore enjoyed a spectacular freshman year for the Eagles last season. Having been relatively unheralded, since he was not from a hockey-oriented area, such as Massachusetts, Detroit or Minnesota, he surprised a few by becoming first-string goalie.

Boston College had long been one of the great powers in hockey, but the Eagles had fallen on tough times recently. Now youths like Skidmore, Joe Mullen, a flashy forward from Manhattan, and Joe Augustine, a defenseman from Chicago, have led them back.

Skidmore had a 13-10-1 won-lost-tied record last season, yielding 4.2 goals a game and compiling the East's second-best percentage of saves to shots on goal (88.5).

His best performance came in the Beanpot Tournament, when, with 44 saves, he led the Eagles to a 6-3 upset victory in the finals over the archrival, and Eastern champion, Boston University.

Chosen Rookie of the Year

This triumph gave the Eagles the "championship of Boston," as the Beanpot involves all four major collegiate squads in the Boston area — Boston College, Boston University, Harvard and Northeastern. Boston College hadn't won this "title" in a decade.

Skidmore was named rookie of the year in the Eastern College Athletic Conference and was a fourth-round draft selection of the St. Louis Blues of the N.H.L. and their general manager and coach, Emile Francis.

[E]astern Football Held to Be First Class

[...]nth, sometimes Cornell or Pennsyl[vania]; occasionally Yale), Boston Col[lege], Holy Cross—and Fordham and [Colu]mbia back in the 1930's and New [York] University before that—and, to[day], Penn State and Pittsburgh.

[F]or sectional strength, a dozen or so [...] schools would have to return to [pro]minence—and there is no indication [that] so many will, or intend to try. [W]hat this reflects, really, is the radi[call]y different nature of big-time col[lege] football today from the time when [one] could argue about "strong" con[fere]nces and sectional superiority.

[T]ake, for example, the situation on [the] Pacific Coast. The University of [Sout]hern California and the University [of C]alifornia, Los Angeles have become [pere]nnial powerhouses. They belong to [a co]nference called the Pacific-8. It in[clud]es Stanford, the University of Cali[forni]a at Berkeley, Oregon, Oregon [State], Washington and Washington [State]. There is a full round-robin [sche]dule. The conference champion be[come]s the host team in the Rose Bowl. [The] host team in the Rose Bowl has [been] U.S.C. or U.C.L.A. in 10 of the [1]2 years (Stanford made it in 1971 [and] 1972). U.S.C.'s 10-year won-lost [recor]d against the four teams in Ore[gon] and Washington is 34-3; U.C.L.A. [h]ad trouble with Washington, but [is ...]-3 with a tie against the other [...].

[A] similar discrepancy exists in the [...]wed Big Ten. Ohio State and [Mich]igan have won or shared the last [...] titles, since 1968. In the Big Eight, [it's b]een Oklahoma or Nebraska every [year] since 1966, although Missouri [mana]ged to share a title in 1969 and [...]as in 1968. In the Southeastern [Confe]rence, it's been Alabama, Geor[gia o]r Florida in seven of the last 10 years—and they are the three contenders now. The Southwest Conference, dominated by Texas through most of the last decade, is now headed by Texas Tech (a recent entry) and Arkansas (usually the chief challenger to Texas). In all these fabled leagues, the lower teams are further than ever from the level of the leaders—and those trailers include what used to be among football's most glamorous names—Southern Methodist and Texas Christian, Tennessee and Louisiana State, Kansas, Northwestern and Wisconsin.

Colleges Have to Choose

What has happened is a separation by choice. The demands of fully-utilized two-platoon football, ever-rising expenses, changing composition of student bodies and shifting goals in the whole educational community have made it impossible to have a powerful national football team "in the ordinary course of events." A special and continuing effort must be made in recruiting and money raising, and only the most dedicated programs can succeed at that level. Football must come first, with ever greater effort, and other considerations second.

Neither recruiting, nor cheating nor academic compromise is new to college football, having been well documented half a century ago and repeatedly revealed since. But the intensity of competition for television and bowl game receipts (which run to hundreds of thousands of dollars for the successful schools) has widened the gap between those who will go all out and those who won't; and those who go only half-heartedly, or with innocent hope, or with insufficient funds, wind up alongside those who won't. Going all out does not necessarily imply cheating; it does require giving top priority to football needs.

In the East, the Ivies won't, and the service academies won't, and most of the independents won't. Penn State has long been able to integrate a successful football program into its overall structure; Pittsburgh has found a way to return to a standard it maintained decades ago, and Rutgers is moving up. But few other Eastern schools can move into the U.S.C.-Ohio State-Oklahoma-Alabama league, or seriously want to.

Those who feel strong emotional attachment to Eastern football will have to continue to accept it, by and large, in its own context, which is probably a healthy one. In other sections, the top-heavy conferences show increasing strains, held together only by the sharing of bowl game money. (The Pacific-8, for one, is considering the admission of Arizona and Arizona State, and perhaps dropping its northern members). The dollar cost of big-time football programs keeps rising, and the benefits get harder to measure. If the talked-about super conference of national powers, leaning toward a championship tournament, ever comes about, it is not likely to contain many Eastern schools.

In addition, there are memories, which are not to be sneered at. The legenday names — Chris Cagle and Glenn Davis and Doc Blanchard of Army, Clint Frank and Larry Kelley of Yale, Chuck Bednarik of Pennsylvania, Sid Luckman of Columbia, Dick Kazmaier of Princeton, Jimmy Brown of Syracuse and a hundred others—became national figures for their college exploits, not merely as hot pro prospects. (On the list of schools supplying pro players over the last 40 years, the only eastern school in the top 15 is Pittsburgh).

College football then meant, primarily, local and traditional rivalries, and winning records, not national rankings and bowl invitations. In that framework, the crowded East, with more than 50 colleges fielding teams within a radius of 400 miles, was well suited to invent, develop, dominate and eventually retain a major share of national football interest. It originated overemphasis and launched deemphasis.

Since television, two platoons and the pre-eminence of the pros, the East is not fertile ground for what major college football has become. The clock won't be turned back. A handful of Eastern schools can and may make it in the polls, and they should be congratulated, but most of the Eastern schools won't, and they should be congratulated, too.

[O]ther View Treats Claim as Illusion

[...] really good football teams in the [East] every year," said Joe Paterno, the [coach] at Penn State, who often paid a [price] for being identified with what [the re]st of the country regarded as in[ferior] football. "That's really all you [can as]k from any section."

[Th]e time for knocking Eastern foot[ball is] over," adds Johnny Majors, who [grew] up in the South, coached in the [Big Ei]ght Conference and rebuilt Pitt's [fortun]es. "Now, the answer is don't [knock] it unless you've tried it."

[Disc]ussions with coaches, athletes, [admini]strators and alumni point to a [numbe]r of factors behind the improve[ment]. Some of the most important are:

[¶Th]e decision four years ago to end [the s]o-called "Big Four" agreement [amon]g Penn State, Pittsburgh, West [Virgin]ia and Syracuse has provided [more] flexibility in their football pro[grams]. The agreement had limited the [numbe]r of scholarships, prohibited ["red-sh]irting" and stressed tougher aca[demic] requirements than most major [confe]rences.

[¶T]he limitation on scholarships at [the n]ational level. All were exposed to what winning required. "Our locker rooms look like the ones Jock Sutherland's teams used," said Majors, who renovated Pitt's facilities, besides rejuvenating the football program.

¶High school prospects in the East no longer seem awed by attending faraway schools with strange-sounding nicknames. Bowl trips, more competitive schedules, national television and national rankings can be achieved, even while playing in front of parents and friends.

The climate on Eastern campuses is more conductive to an acceptance of football as part of the total collegiate picture. In the late 1960's, a wave of protest and cynicism exposed the dehumanizing side of the sport and created considerable concern over the merits of sustaining large-scale programs. Army and Navy were caught in the Vietnam crossfire; Syracuse underwent serious racial discord, and Maryland and Villanova treated football as No. 2 to other sports.

Even with a new identity, Eastern schools will never enjoy the dominance or charisma that accompanied the Blanchard-Davis war teams at Army or the "Seven Blocks of Granite" at Fordham.

But Tony Dorsett has given Pitt followers a name to cherish alongside Marshall Goldberg, the legendary running back of the late 1930's. And Dorsett is the kid next door, from Aliquippa, Pa.

Maryland, another team with a proud football past, is linked with the South through the Atlantic Coast Conference but its roots are in the East: of the 67 players on the current Terrapin roster, 38 are from Pennsylvania (17), New Jersey (13) and New York (8).

The strongest source of criticism leveled at Eastern schools in the past has been their "soft" schedules. But collegiate schedules often are drawn up eight to 10 years in advance.

Alabama, for example, has beaten three teams with won-lost records that would be embarrassing to anyone: Southern Methodist (2-7), Vanderbilt (1-7) and Southern Mississippi (0-8). Are these teams any tougher than Navy, Syracuse and Holy Cross on the Boston College schedule? Probably not.

Last year, Pitt played Georgia, Oklahoma, Notre Dame and Penn State and still finished 8-4. Next year, the Panthers will face Florida and Notre Dame, among others.

Ivy Confused With East

By a strange coincidence, Maryland Penn State will not meet this year. But the schools had played annually since 1960 and will renew ties again next season through at least 1980.

Another factor behind the low acceptance of Eastern football has been a tendency to lump the Ivy League and the various independents into the same Lambert Trophy barrell. To many college football fans in Lincoln, Neb.; Starksville, Miss., and Waco, Tex., the Ivy League IS Eastern football, for better or worse. Penn State has always been considered something of a freak, a convenient excuse for bypassing the Paterno teams in postseason bowl consideration.

In a sense, Penn State's ability to retain an athletic-academic perspective has rubbed off on other Eastern schools. Faced with a decision on whether to throw in the towel or muster financial support, many college presidents decided a better, more balanced system beat punting.

The New York Times
Sid Luckman, Columbia

For the moment, the strategy is working. It should continue as long as no major whistles are blown or severe penalties marked off by the N.C.A.A. for recruiting violations or under-the-table expenditures.

Meanwhile, the Ivy League will continue doing its own thing, successfully. And if the rest of the country learns to accept Pitt and Penn State and others, perhaps it may grow to understand what makes Ivy grow.

Army Pins First Loss On Colgate

Special to The New York Times

WEST POINT, N.Y., Nov. 13—Army spoiled Coglate's bid for big-time recognition today with a 29-13 victory over the previously unbeaten Red Raiders.

Leamon Hall, the Cadets' 6-foot-5-inch junior quarterback, continued to rewrite the Academy record book by completing 14 of 31 passes for 195 yards and three touchdowns and throwing his 13th and 14th scoring passes of the season.

The Army defense, roughed up by another unbeaten team, Pittsburgh, last week, produced crucial fourth-quarter interceptions by George Mayes, Phil Macklin and Steve Smith that foiled a Colgate comeback attempt.

Trailing, 16-10, early in the second quarter, the Red Raiders closed to within 3 points at the start of the final period on two touchdown passes from Bob Relph, the quarterback, to Keith Polito, a split end.

But Hall engineered a 14-play, 80-yard scoring drive that consumed almost seven minutes of the final quarter. The rangy 215-pounder from Opoptka, Fla., converted on four third-down plays, including a 7-yard touchdown toss to his favorite, receiver, Clennie Brundidge, the tight end, with 7 minutes 58 seconds left.

Passing Mark for Hall

Army fashioned a 16-0 lead on a 29-yard field goal by Mike Castelli and Hall's 13th and 14th touchdown passes of the season, breaking a school record that had stood since Arnold Galiffa set his in 1949.

A 9-yard toss to Don Briggs, with 1:40 left in the first quarter, capped a 12-play, 48-yard Cadet scoring drive. It came on third down and was Hall's fourth successful third-down execution on the march.

Castelli's seventh successful field goal, in eight attempts this year, made it 10-0, with 4:52 left in the period. On the second play of the second quarter at the Army 41, Hall threw deep down the left sideline toward Jim Merriken, who had beaten the left cornerback, Paul Lawler, by a step.

Merriken, whose longest reception of the season had been 13 yards, caught the pass at the Colgate 14 and sprinted into the end zone.

The Cadets had an opportunity to increase their lead on the next series, reaching the Red Raider 13-yard line. But Hall's second-down pass to the right sideline was underthrown. Pete Wise intercepted the ball at the 2-yard line and returned it 54 yards before Hall's tackle prevented a Colgate touchdown.

A 41-yard pass from Hall to George Dunaway, a split end, figured in the final Army score. Colgate was called for interference on the play at the Cadet 1-yard line. Greg King put it over on a run from 2 yards out.

The victory, before a chilled Michie Stadium crowd of 29,637, evened Army's won-lost record at 5-5 and equaled the total number of triumphs in Coach Homer Smith's first two seasons. A victory over Navy on Nov. 27 in Philadelphia could give the Black Knights their first winning season since 1972.

Colgate had allowed only 88 points in eight previous victories and was rated fifth nationally in total defense. Bowl bids and a possible national television date with Rutgers were among today's inducements for the Red Raiders, who had been overshadowed as an Eastern undefeated team by Pittsburgh and Rutgers.

Army, however, was too big, strong and versatile. Devon Maness, a sophomore running back, rushed for 103 yards in 24 carries, many of them off option pitchouts from Hall, and Greg McGlasker and Don Briggs each caught five passes.

In contrast, Relph, Colgate's 6-foot, 175-pound junior leader, completed only 9 of 25 passes for 114 yards, and often threw on the run or off balance. The key interception by Mayes, a 214-pound freshman linebacker from Orange, N.J., came after a deflection at the line of scrimmage.

flailing football players, though none was seriously hurt and few were hit. But Dorsett, the first to throw a punch, was out. He walked to the dressing room as the cheers from most of the 56,500 persons rang in his ears. He was still Dorsett the herot of Pitt football.

Dorsett had done his weekly rewrite on the record book, increasing his career rushing mark to 5,855 yards with one game to go. He also raised his record for most carries to 1,036 rushes with his 33 attempts today. He raised his career record all-purpose running to 6,391 yards (for rushing, pass-receiving and kick returns).

Pitt Luses 5 Fumbles

But while he was doing this, other Pitt players lost five fumbles to the Mountaineers, who scored after three of them: two touchdowns and a field goal.

Matt Cavanaugh lost three fumbles to West Virginia. The Pittsburgh quarterback had suffered a badly bruised right elbow early in the game. The swollen arm was drained at half-time by the team doctor, and he came back to pass and run from quarterback.

Yet his fumbles prevented a Pitt runaway and gave a chance to West Virginia, a team with four victories and six defeats.

Pitt never trailed as Dorsett opened the scoring with his most exciting play of the day, a 17-yard skipping and twisting run on a pitch to the right side. He went fast to the sidelines, then faster down the white line as he just sneaked by five tacklers into the end zone midway in the first period.

Bill McKenzie kicked a 22-yard field goal for the Mountaineers shortly after they recovered a fumbled punt on the Pitt 22. Dorsett went in from the 2 in the second period for Pitt.

Michigan Victor in 38-7 Rout

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Nov. 13 (AP)—Rob Lytle scored three touchdowns and became Michigan's all-time rushing leader today as the fourth-ranked Wolverines rolled to a 38-7 Big Ten victory over Illinois.

Lytle scored on a 5-yard pass from Rick Leach in the second quarter, and on runs of 13 and 3 yards in the third period as Michigan raised its conference won-lost record to 6-1 and 9-1 over all, heading into next Saturday's showdown championship game at Ohio State.

Lytle, a senior from Fremont, Ohio, running at both fullback and tailback, rushed for 89 yards and raised his career total at 3,085—13 more than the previous Michigan record set by Billy TTaylor from 1969 through 1971.

For Illinois, now 3-4 in the conference and 4-6 over all, Dan Beaver, a kicker tied 186 points set by Red Grange when he kicked an extra point after a two-yard touchdown run by Chubby Phillips in the first quarter.

That score came after Michigan tallied on an 11-yard run by Leach that capped a 61-yard, 11-play drive on the Wolverines' first possession.

The other Michigan scoring came on a seven-yard, Leach-to-Mark Schmerge in the second quarter and Rob Wood's 37-yard field goal in the final period.

The Michigan Stadium crowd of 104,107 gave the Wolverines a total of 722,113 for their seven home games—an average of 103,159—breaking the old collegiate mark of 98,449 set last year at Michigan.

Ohio State 9, Minnesota 3

MINNEAPOLIS, Nov. 13 (UPI)—Jim Pacenta, a quarterback, scored on a 4-yard keeper and Tom Skladany booted a 39-yard field goal today that gave Ohio State a 9-3 victory over Minnesota. The victory enabled the Buckeyes to clinch at least a tie for the Big Ten championship. Ohio State will meet Michigan for the title next Saturday.

Ohio State controlled the game on the ground with Jeff Logan rushing 30 times for 116 yards. Logan, who entered the game with 990 yards rushing, went over the 1000-yard mark with a 6-yard run midway through the first quarter.

The Buckeyes built a 9-3 halftime lead on Skladany's field goal and Placenta's touchdown run.

Skladany booted a field goal with 4:18 gone in the first quarter after Ohio State had driven to the Minnesota 22-yard line. The big play in the drive was a 16-yard pass from Placenta to Greg Storer.

Indiana 15, Wisconsin 14

BLOOMINGTON, Ind., Nov. 13 (UPI)—Underdog Indiana beat Wisconsin, 15-14, on Ric Enis' 1-yard plunge and a 2-point conversion by Tim McVay.

Wisconsin led by 14-0 at the half and seemed to be in command when the Hoosiers did a turnabout at the start of the third period. They controlled the remainder of the game.

Navy 34, Georgia Tech 28

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Nov. 13 (AP)—Navy's tailback, Joe Gattuso, ran 25 yards for one touchdown and teamed with the quarterback, Bob Leszczynski, on a 75-yard pass for another as the Midshipmen defeated Georgia Tech, 34-28, today.

Leszczynski, the sophomore quarterback who came off the bench at midseason and put some drive into Navy's punchless attack, also threw two touchdown passes to Kevin Sullivan in leading the Middies to their second victory in a row and their third in 10 games.

Navy got on the scoreboard first, late in the opening period, and led the entire way, although Georgia Tech's quarterback, Gary Lanier, staying mostly on the ground, kept the Yellowjackets in striking distance.

Navy got 6 points on two field goals by Bob Tata and picked up 2 points on a safety with about 2½ minutes to play. One of Tata's field goals came as the clock ran out at the end of the first half and the other, a 44-yarder, was the longest of his career.

fumble gave Harvard enough turnovers for scoring opportunities, but Yale stopped all but one. The victors' defense, led by the middle kuard, Keith Bassi, stopped Harvard inside the Bulldog 10-yard line twice, once in the second period and once in the fourth.

The latter was he last gasp for the Crimson, which wound up the season with six victories and three defeats. With a chance to score 6, 7 or 8 points and close the 14-point Yale lead, Harvard got to the Yale 1 on a fourth-down pass play, Jim Kubacki to Chris Doherty, the fullback, but Steve Skrovan, the safety, stopped Doherty there and that was all for Harvard.

For Carmen Cozza, the Yale coach, who has indicated he may give up this vocation now that he is the university's athletic director, the victory at Cambridge terminated a series of indignities and defeats his terms had suffered here. They had won only once before at Harvard Stadium in the last decade and Cozza can never forget the 29-29 tie of 1968 or the loss in the last 10 seconds two years ago that cost the Elis an undefeated season.

Rizzo Put In at Quarterback

Cozza boldly changed quarterbacks replacing a senior, Stone Phillips, with Bob Rizzo, a junior, after two of Phillips's passes had been intercepted and he had been shaken up after a hard tackle. Rizzo did not do better with the pass but he was good at handing the ball to Pagliaro.

Yale's big playmaker, who gained 1,003 yards this season and scored 16 touchdowns to lead the Ivy Leaguers in both skills, was the important figure in the scoring drives of 42, 31 and 58 yards. Pagliaro's longest run was a 34-yard dash round right end, and his best a 5-yard sprint to the end zone for a touchdown that put Yale ahead at the end of the third quarter.

The second drive was set up following a damaging fumble by Kubacki, Harvard's stalwart quarterback playing with a painfully sore back. Kubacki and the fine halfback, Tommy Winn, handled the ball on every Harvard offensive play except for three. Winn gaining 95 yards. But Yale never let this dangerous back in the end zone and also repeatedly stopped Kubacki, who had led Harvard to another last-minute victory a year ago in the Yale Bowl.

Brown Wins, Gains Part Of Ivy Title

selves," Anderson said.

In the final quarter, though, they finally made some moves toward their half of the title. They recovered an errant Columbia pitchout, and they drove 47 yards for the touchdown that, with the conversion, put them in front for the first time, 21-17. Hill twisted his way into the end zone from 1 yard out after Morris had carried six times for 29 yards on the drive.

Then they sealed the victory with a 2-yard touchdown burst by Hill after he had scampered 54 yards to the Columbia 3.

Spinosa Stars for Lions

Bryson nearly became one of Brown's goats (there were many candidates in the first three quarters) when a Paul Michalko pass deflected off his hands into Dave Spinosa's midway through the third quarter.

Minutes before Spinosa had intercepted another Michalko pass at the Columbia 3, but the Lions couldn't get anywhere and had to punt.

Then came the second interception. Spinosa grabbed the ball at the Columbia 22 and carried it to the Brown 40.

"The first one was my fault," said Michalko, who last Saturday set a Brown record for passing yardage in a game. "It was a bad play. I don't know what I was thinking about. But the second one could've been caught."

The Lions were leading, 17-14, at the time, but again they couldn't take advantage of Spinosa's fine efforts. On first down, Cal Moffie, the quarterback, flipped a pitchout over Paul McCormick's head and Bob Miller fell on the ball for Brown at the Columbia 47.

Brown had the ball four times in the first half but scored on only one possession, Michalko tying the game, 7-7, with a 7-yard run in the first quarter.

The Bruins' mistakes killed the three other possessions. Hill fumbled the ball away at Columbia's 1-yard line in the first quarter, and penalties stymied the Bruins twice in the second quarter.

Brown was moving smoothly early in the quarter, reaching the Lions' 10-yard line. However, illegal-motion and offensive-pass-interference penalties on successive plays set the Bruins back to the 30, and they couldn't recover. Marty Fischer, a linebacker, batted down Michalko's third-down pass, and the quarterback's fourth-down toss to Bob Farnham, gained 12 yards instead of the necessary 24.

Dartmouth Trounces Princeton

By DEANE McGOWEN

Special to The New York Times

PRINCETON, N.J., Nov. 13—Princeton University's football team, once a respected power in Ivy League football, has fallen upon dismal days.

Today in Palmer Stadium, before an overcoat-and-blanket crowd of 14,500 fans, the Tigers lost their 11th straight game on their home field. This time Dartmouth, an old rival, ground out a 33-7 victory behind the running of Sam Coffey and Vic Oberg and the poised signal-calling of Kevin Case, the left-handed quarterback.

In addition to the dartmouth offensive line's powerful blocking, the winner's convincing defense dominated the Princeton offense throughout the game.

Defenders Stand Out

Among those Big Green defenders to stand out were Dave Casper, John Mugglebee, Kevin Young, Marty Milligan, Dave Stone and John Carney.

Casper's recovery of a Mike Howard fumble sent Dartmouth off to a lead it never relinquished. The Big Green drove 36 yards in six plays, Case going the final 3 yards. Nick Lowery kicked the first of his four conversion points, giving Dartmouth a 7-0 margin with 4 minutes 40 seconds gone in the game.

Then Dartmouth took advantage of a Princeton quick kick that went only to the Dartmouth 44. In nine plays the Big Green drove 56 yards, and Lowery kicked a field goal.

In the closing minute of the period, Dartmouth was in the Princeton end zone again, marching 35 yards in five plays, following a short Princton punt. Princeton never got beyond 35-yard line in that opening quarter, and by then Dartmouth had taken a 17-0 lead.

Tigers Avert Shutout

The Tigers averted a shutout just before the half, moving 45 yards in eight plays. The touchdown came on an 18-yard pass from Jack Flannery to Mike Carter. Paul Zoubeck added the extra point.

Dartmouth scored its third touchdown at 13:35 of the third period, a 43-yard march in 10 plays, with Oberg driving the final yard. Stone made Dartmouth's final touchdown, intercepting a Kirby Lockhart pass on the Princeton 25 and running the ball in.

Lockhart had just entered the game when the Dartmouth defensive halfback stole his pass. Ken Jannsson added Dartmouth's final points, a safety, when he nailed Princeton's third quarterback, in the end zone with less than a minute to play.

The victory was Dartmouth's sixth of the campaign against three losses and its fourth victory in seven league games. Princeton, suffering through another horrible campaign, finished with a 2-7 mark (2-5 in the league).

Harry Wilson, Dartmouth's slender split end, set a season catching record. He had five in the game for 54 yards, giving him 40 receptions for the season and 646 yards, both school records. His career receptions tied a Dartmouth record.

Coffey was Dartmouth's main offensive threat on the ground. The halfback carried the ball 21 times for 114 yards. In all, Dartmouth's total offense was good for 374 yards. Case picked up 133 of that total, completing 10 of 15 attempts. Dartmouth ran off 79 plays to Princeton's 57.

Coach Praises Wilson

Jake Crouthamel, Dartmouth's coach, said of Wilson, "For a man coming off a shoulder separation, he had an excellent game. Case finished the year in fine style, too."

As to Dartmouth's season, Crouthame said, "We were not completely satisfied with a 6-3 record, but it will have to do. I thought our defense played very well. It was nice to see them get a few points."

Princeton got a solid performance from its running back, Carter. The flanker carried the ball nine times and picked up 45 yards, but he was just about all the offense the Tigers had. Bobby Isom, who still has not recovered from an early-season injury, carried seven times for 23 yards. Flannery kept the Tigers respectable, throwing 16 passes and completing nine of them for 111 yards.

Princeton lost the ball four times on fumbles and had one pass intercepted. The Tigers had to rely upon their defensive unit, but Dartmouth's strong ground game wore the Tigers down as the game progressed, and it was Princeton's lack of an offense that was the ultimate difference between the teams.

P.G.A. Tour Players Altering Florida Course for Championship

By JOHN S. RADOSTA
Special to The New York Times

ONTE VEDRA BEACH, Fla., Nov. For three seasons the Tournament ers Championship has floundered ne and space without a fixed posi- on the circuit of the Professional ers' Association tour. In geography s wandered from Atlanta to Fort h, and on the calendar it has ed from March to September.

is uncertainty has been one of the nesses of the tournament, which P. G. A. tour is eager to promote a profitable showcase event, with or" status on a level with the Unit- tates and British Opens, the Mas- and the championship of the per- G.A. organization.

$275,000 Improvement

w the T.P.C., as it is known, ap- to have found a "permanent" for at least the next five years an option to renew. On the sched- it will replace the 12-year-old er Jacksonville open, March 17- s purse will be $300,000, and it ave a new venue.

new site is Sawgrass, a rather lt golf course on a land-develop- project in this town just below onville Beach. It is long, 7,174 . Water comes into play on 10 holes. It has 95 sand traps and "links" bunkers. Its inherent difficulty will be amplified by the strong winds that are common to Florida in the spring.

Since mid-August Gardner Dickinson, a former touring professional, has been supervising a $275,000 program of altering this two-year-old course to make it suitable for championship play. The improvement work will go on for the next few years, as time and money allow. Some aspects of the face-lifting have created controversy among tour players.

Aside from the three banks that took over Sawgrass from the original developer a year ago, the biggest booster is Deane Beman, commissioner of the P.G.A. tour. Beman organized a strongly promoted "media day" opening ceremony on Thursday, with Jack Nicklaus, two-time winner of the T.P.C. and five other touring pros invited to play and appraise the course. Under the circumstances it was clear they had come not to bury Sawgrass but to praise it.

After shooting a two-under-par 72, Nicklaus said, "This is a well-balanced golf course, as tough as any we have played. There are situations that are severe, but I think we should have them in tournaments.

"With the amount of work that's been done without changing the surfaces of the greens, it is a good golf course. If there is any criticism, it's that the par-3 holes are too much the same in length."

Andy North, who shot 74, added: "You've got to hit good golf shots to score here. If you don't, you'll shoot big numbers, and that's the way it should be.

"We don't play many courses where you have to hit every shot well. This is one. And this course will change dramatically as wind conditions change."

Edward Sneed, who shot 73, thought the course was "laid out very well." He found it a "good test of golf, with good potential."

"With all this marshland around," Sneed continued, "it will be very demanding. Under windy conditions the greens will be hard to hit. And I like the beauty, the contrast between the natural and prepared areas."

Receding to Start

Beman, who makes frequent inspection trips here from his Washington headquarters, constantly emphasizes how "stern" a test of golf skills Sawgrass will be next March.

In the spring the wind blows out of the northeast, into and across the big, crucial holes. Bob Ross, the home pro and a former tour regular, says several of the par-4 greens will be hard to reach in two shots.

Right now the course still bears the scars of bulldozing and patching, and the grass is brown from recent frosts. The grass also is "tight," with no length at all because of the frost and the heavy use of golf carts by members. Fairways are so hard that they yield rolls of 75 to 100 yards, and Dickinson is trying to soften them.

A program to reseed the entire layout will begin next week, and, given favorable growing conditions, the grass should be properly green and tall by next spring.

The most controversial hole is the fourth, a par 5 of 527 yards. The fairway is conventional, with water and marsh on the left and across the width. What makes the hole tricky is the small rectangular green, elevated high above the fairway and set in a sort of cul de sac.

To miss this green is disastrous. On the left side is a swamp, absolutely impenetrable. On the right, sloping down to the putting surface, is an expanse of cabbage-like vegetation hard to plow through with a golf club. The frontal area is an uphill slope covered totally by strong rough. Behind the green is a narrow opening between two dunes or mounds, and that is covered by sand and a wooden boardwalk.

On top of everything else, the green is built in two tiers.

The consensus is that few players will birdie this hole. The standard approach will be to lay up short of the rough slope and then pitch on with a wedge—or a bigger club if the wind is strong.

It is commonly understood, although no one is saying so at this time, that the green eventually will be moved or drastically rebuilt.

Obstacles Removed

Dickinson, an experienced player with 22 years on the pro tour, has tried to create, with his relatively limited budget, a "links" atmosphere suggestive of the seaside courses of England and Scotland. Toward this objective he uses lots of water, sand and marshland grasses.

Dickinson has added a hazard not very familiar in the United States—21 "links" or "waste" bunkers. These are sandy mounds decorated by clumps of pampas grass. Moreover, Dickinson has built 20 conventional sand traps and reshaped and deepened all the original bunkers. Some are huge enough to make exit an adventure.

Dickinson also has removed the dozens of mounds that the original designer built on the fairways and green areas, arguing that they were unreasonable for tournament play and that they obscured the view of the players. Finally, he has reduced the size of several greens to make them proportionate to the length of the holes.

By next March, the rough will have grown, and driving areas will be defined to 35 or 40 yards wide.

Alterations are being paid for by the three banks that own the Sawgrass development, and they expect to recoup their capital investment in three to five years from rental of the golf course to the sponsor, Florida Publico Charities, Inc. The promotional value of the tournament is also expected to stimulate sales. Sixty of Sawgrass's 200 condominiums and town houses are unsold, and a companion project on the property has even more unoccupied units.

Beyond a certain amount of money, which Beman will not divulge, the P.G.A. tour will pay for alterations of the golf course. Beman recognizes that it is impossible to develop a first-class golf course in one year.

"This is a long-range program," he said, "and we are going to keep on improving the facilities."

ootball a Fading Memory at U. of Tampa

MPA, Fla., Nov. 13 (AP)—At the f 22, Mike Calderon is a faded a warrior of a bygone era. He a tackle for the University of a Spartans when college football dropped for financial reasons two years ago.

don't thinw anyone remembers id Calderon, a junior and one of our football players still at the s.

he last eight years, 45 colleges dropped football.

ebruary 1975, Tampa announced abandoning its 38-year-old foot- ogram. It was a loser, said Dr. wens, the 41-year-old university nt. He said it was creating defi- nding and pushing the private ar liberal arts college toward ptcy.

Deficit Cited by Trustees

nine years, football produced a of $1,189,000, according to the ber board of trustees.

s endured the wrath of an en- community. A threat on his life police protection from the uni- and the city.

theless, the program that had d such professional athletes as l Gaizo, Leon McQuay, Darryl , John Matuszak and Freddie n was gone.

Tampa struggled for years to reach the major college ranks and was the smallest of 126 major-division schools in the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

There were those who wanted the university to drop the program from major-college to small-college competition within the N.C.A.A. That could have reduced expenditures with a season of games against small, closer-to-home teams, they argued.

Alumni Support Drops

There were those who opposed the university's losing 226,000 in 70 athletic scholarships. There was the enraged alumni who immediately dropped 50 percent of its financial support.

And there were long-time supporters who insisted the deficit was nothing more than "paper figures."

But Owens said the deficit spending was $170,000 for the 1974-75 season. The university projected losses totaling $226,000 for 1976-77 and $402,840 for 1976-77 when placed in competition for ticket sales with the National Football League expansion team, the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Ninety percent of the faculty backed the move to cancel the sport. Dr. Francis Gillen, an English professor, said he would have approved retaining football "only if there had been equal emphasis on academics."

Funds that could have gone into the educational process were being drained, he said, and athletes spent their time on practice instead of study and became classroom burdens.

The furor has died now. The university has improved academically, according to surveys.

There is little campus talk of the football days. Some freshmen say they only discovered during registration that there ever was a football team.

"The kids aren't running around like it's a party school. Now it's down to academics," said Bob Tezzi, president of the Student Government Association.

Steve Mingione, a senior agreed.

"Everyone is kind of over it now," he said. "It's hardly talked about."

Enrollment has jumped from 2,000 to 2,608 since the football program ended. The high school grade average of incoming freshmen has risen from 2.15 to 2.49 on a scale of 4.0.

"About two-thirds [of the football team] couldn't be admitted under the present academic standards," said Walter O. Turner, admissions director. "Most were conditional students."

Only Four Remain

Of the 58 players with scholarship eligibility, 47 either dropped out or were recruited by athletic staffs of other universities. Seven others were graduated.

Today, four former players remain, juniors and seniors working toward their degrees.

One senior, John Heath of Brandenton, was a quarterback and his roommate Lindsey Darnell of Seminole, also a senior, was a fullback. They had full scholarships and stayed on to study business management.

"I liked the school," said Darnell. "I was also tired of getting banged up . . . [But] I thought dropping football was the worst thing they could have done. A lot of people would rather see a college team play than a pro team—particularly when the pro team doesn't win."

The Bucs, in their first year, have lost all 9 of their games.

Calderon, a sociology major, also stayed in Tampa where his widowed mother lived, where his wife worked and at the school that would honor his full scholarship.

Second Thoughts

Now, he is wondering if he made the right decision by refusing other collegiate offers. Maybe he had the talent for professional football, he thinks, and maybe the plague of injuries would have disappeared.

But, he said, "I may have gone somewhere else and gotten injured in the first scrimmage."

The other former Spartan is Tom Hobson who was on a one-year renewable scholarship and now is a junior studying criminology and business. He has a 3.2 average.

Tampa still participates in other sports.

With football, said Owens, "You are talking about $30,000-to-$45,000 to move the team for an away game, depending on the distance. With a tennis team that plays in the general region, you are talking about a station wagon taking them."

Mazzilli's Homer for Mets 'Biggest Thrill as Rookie'

Lee Mazilli of Brooklyn tried to hit the ball for what he called "the gap in right center." Eddie Yost, the third-base coach, gave the 21-year-old center fielder the hit sign with two balls and no strikes. Mazzilli swung and hit Kent Tekulve's fastball 390 feet over the right-field fence in Shea Stadium and gave the Mets a 5-4 ninth-inning victory over the Pittsburgh Pirates Sept. 19.

"That homer has to be my biggest thrill as a National League rookie," said the 183-pound Mazzilli. On Sept. 8, Mazzilli broke into the majors with a homer in Chicago. He spent the early part of the year with Jackson, Miss., where he hit 13 homers, 11 of them left-handed.

Boston College Pins Loss on Syracuse, 28-14

BOSTON, Nov. 13 (UPI)—Glen Capriola ran for a 6-yard touchdown in third quarter today to give Boston College its first lead of the game and the Eagles went on to down Syracuse, 28-14.

Ken Smith hit Bill Paulsen from 6-yards out and Paul McCarty from 17 yards away for two more Boston College scores. Anthony Browna sophomore running back finished the Eagle scoring with a 6-yard scoring run.

The Orangemen, who did not score after losing their starting quartrback, Bill Hurley, with a shoulder injury in the first half, clicked on a 4-yard touchdown strike from Hurley to a tight end, Rich Rosen. A 1-yard dive off tackle by Bob Avery capped the Syracuse scoring.

Hurley ,who left after being hit hard on a bootleg play late in the first half, ran for 91 yard asnd passed for 59 before retiring.

Boston College's winning score was set up when the Syracuse subsitute quarterback, Ron Ferneski, was stripped of the ball on a rollout and a defensive back, Jeff Kaufman recovered on the Syracuse 33.

Staying on the ground, the Eagles staged a six-play drive with Capriola going the last 5 yards topst the Eagles ahead, 21-14. Capriola carried on five of the six plays.

Boston College, down 14-7 at the half, dominated the rest of the game with defense. Farneski a freshman, was intercepted three times and fumbled once.

The triumph pushed Boston College's won-lost record to 6-3, while Syracuse is 3-7.

Ricky Bell Big on Field, Small in Movie Roles

LOS ANGELES (AP)—Southern California's Ricky Bell played bit roles in television during the summer. He was a "policeman," a "parking lot attendant" and an "ambulance driver." But once the season began, Bell was taking no bit parts.

After two games he had averaged 182.5 yards per game on 61 carries for the Trojans and had five touchdowns.

Florida Bows, In 28-9 Upset, To Kentucky

LEXINGTON, Ky., Nov. 13 (AP)—Derrick Ramsey, Kentucky's big quarterback, threw two touchdown passes and led the Wildcats to a 28-9 upset victory over 15th-ranked Florida today. The loss probably denied the Gators their first Southeastern Conference football title.

Florida, baffled throughout the game by a scrappy Wildcat defense, could have clinched a title tie with a victory. But Ramsey, a 6-foot-4-inch, 222-pounder, connected with Dave Trosper on a strange 52-yard scoring play in the final minute of the opening half and came back with a 17-yarder to Randy Brooks in the third quarter moments after Florida had made a bid to get back into the game.

The pass to Trosper demoralized the Gators and personified Florida's frustration in S.E.C. competition. It appeared that Terry LeCount would intercept at the 5, but at the last moment his teammate, Warren Gaffney tipped the ball and it fell into the hands of Trosper for the touchdown.

4 Scoring Drives

Ramsey led the domineering Wildcat offense with 17 carries for 80 yards and 5 completions in 8 attempts for another 111 yards as Kentucky put together scoring drives of 54, 62, 75 and 85 yards.

Kentucky's other scoring came on a 6-yard run by Chris Hill and a 29-yard run by Rod Stewart as the Wildcats lifted their won-lost record to 6-4 and 3-2 in the S.E.C.

Florida, which fell to 6-3 and 4-2, scored on Berj Pepremian's 42-yard field goal and a 9-yard pass from Jimmy Fisher to Tony Green.

Tennessee 32, Mississippi 6

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., Nov. 13 (AP)—Sparked by Andy Spiva and Jeff Moore, Tennessee's defense forced Mississippi into 10 turnovers and the Vols went on to a 32-6 Southeastern Conference victory today.

Moore, a sophomore starting his first game as cornerback, had two of Tennesse's five interceptions off the Mississippi quarterback, Bobby Garner. Spiva, with one of the interceptions and one of the five Tennessee fumble recoveries, sparked the Vols' defense with seven tackles and six assists.

Three Years of Pro Ball Enough for One Uclan

LOS ANGELES (AP)—Burr Baldwin, a key figure in the University of California, Los Angeles first two Rose Bowl games after the 1942 and 1946 seasons, says, "after three years of pro ball I had had enough."

Baldwin, between his career at UCLA, won three Bronze Star medals in World War II's Battle of the Bulge. He was an infantry captain. He also served in Korea.

Baldwin, now living in Bakersfield, Calif., says that when he played college ball there were three coaches on a team. "Now," he says, "they have eight coaches."

Practice in Parking Lot Starts Long Golf Career

TAMIMENT, Pa. (AP)—Twenty-one years ago Vince Yanovitch went to a parking lot with a borrowed 7-iron. He hit about two dozen balls. Harry Obitz, a golf pro, saw Yanovitch that first morning. In subsequent mornings, Obitz gave Vince brief lessons with various irons, then woods.

Yanovitch now is in his 17th season as the head pro with a staff of assistants at the Tamiment Resort and Country Club here. The native of Exeter, Pa., now 39, was a bellman at Shawnee Inn and Country Club, began cleaning golf clubs, worked in the pro shop and then joined Obitz's group for exhibitions.

1980 Olympics To Be Event Of No Frills

MOSCOW (UPI)—The 1980 Olympic Games will be a no-frills event, says the president of the Moscow organizing committee, Ignaty Novikov.

Writing in the first issue of Olympic Panorama, a glossy magazine that will be published quarterly up to 1980, Novikov said that the primary object was to be ready by July 19, 1980.

"Much remains to be done," he said. "Our primary concern now is to ensure that all building and other work is completed on time."

Novikov said 30 planning organizations involving the country's leading architects are drawing up blueprints for new sports installations in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Minsk and Tallinn, Estonia.

"It is no secret that we want to keep expenditure on Olympic preparations to a minimum. We are also seeking additional sources of finance to recoup outlay. The guiding principle is thrift and moderation. We shall modernize and build everything necessary but without extravagance and waste," Novikov said.

The Mayor of Moscow, Vladimir Promyslov, said, "It is not our intention to make these facilities showy and ostentatious," but he said plans were in hand for reconstruction of existing airports, hotels for 30,000 guests, a youth camp, new motels and suburban camping grounds.

Promyslov said, "There will be no political, economic or technical hindrance to the 1980 Olympic Games in Moscow."

The magazine gave details of plans to build in Moscow a complex of five 28-story hotels accommodating 10,000 guests, a stadium to house sports ranging from basketball to boxing and a press center that afterward will be occupied by the Novosty Press Agency.

The 58-page magazine carried articles on the history of the Olympics, Soviet successes and Soviet cities, illustrated with numerous color pictures. It was printed in Yugoslavia.

Patterson Will Coach Golden Gloves Team

CLIFFSIDE PARK, N.J., Nov. 13—Floyd Patterson, a former heavyweight champion searching for talent that someday will return American prestige to international pro boxing, will coach the New York team against New Jersey in a Golden Gloves competition here Friday night.

The New Jersey Amateur Athletic Union is sanctioning the 10-bout card at the Winston Towers Palisadium, with all proceeds going to the local recreational football program. Sam Sangis, an official of the National A.A.U. is promoting the bout.

Patterson's stable of fighters, each trained by the ex-champion at his New Paltz, N.Y., club, includes a number of division champions from other Golden Gloves meets.

Several former champions and contenders are expected at ringside for the talent search. They include Ike Williams, a six-time lightweight titleholder; Tippy Larkin, a former junior welterweight champion, and Tony Galento, an ex-heavyweight contender.

Seaver Wins More Fans With His Strikeout Ability

Tom Seaver added a few new fans to his cheering section the first Friday in September when he beat the Phillies, 1-0, in a brilliantly pitched game.

After Seaver had ended the game by striking out Mike Schmidt for the third time, the Mets president, Lordinda de Roulet, came onto the field and congratulated the right-hander.

When Seaver fanned Tom Hutton in the seventh, the fans gave him a standing ovation. It was his 200th strikeout of 1976. He has now fanned more than 20[illegible] the last nine years.

Mrs. Phipps's Entry Heads Rich Chase

Special to The New York Times

CAMDEN, S.C., Nov. 13—Straight and True and Happy Intellectual, both from Mrs. Ogden Phipps's stable, head the lineup of 24 starters in the $100,000 Colonial Cup International steeplechase at the Springdale course on Nov. 27.

Straight and True won the American International this year and Happy Intellectual finished second.

Of the starting list, 17 horses are from the United States and seven from Europe.

In addition to Mrs. Phipps's entries, other leading United States starters include Mrs. William L. Van Alen's Life's Illusion, who was named Eclipse jumper of the year in 1975; Woodcrest's Fire Control, winner of the Temple Gwathmey at Belmont Park last month, and Michael G. Walsh's Crag's Corner.

Among the leading foreign starters will be Lord Howard de Walden's champion English hurdler, Lonzarote; D. W. Samuel's New Zealand-bred Grand Canyon Beau Dan of Italy, Quart de Vin of France and Irish Fashion and The Bo-Weevil, both from Ireland.

L.P.G.A. Picks Rochester For Bankers Trust Event

The $75,000 Bankers Trust Golf Classic was added yesterday to the Ladies Professional Golf Association's 1977 tour.

Ray Volpe, the association's commissioner, said the three-day event at the Locust Hill Country Club, Rochester, N. Y., will be held July 8-10. The United States Open was played there four years ago.

College Recruiting of Women Athletes Is Increasing Rapidly

A new recruiting game has developed in the last two years on many a college campus. Women athletes suddenly are in great demand. An estimated 5,000 to 8,000 female athletic scholarships are available and the number is growing every week. Now, when Sally runs, she can win something more substantial than medals, blue ribbons or a frosty handshake from some indignant male she has beaten. If she's really good at running, or at any of more than a dozen other sports, she can earn an almost free college education the same way the super-jocks on the men's varsities do. As a bonus, she'll most likely be a popular figure on the campus of her choice.

Woman in Sports

"It's getting to be more of an in thing to be a female athlete," Dr. Charlotte West, women's athletic director at Southern Illinois University, told United Press International. "In the past, if you were a good athlete and a female, you participated in spite of what the culture said you should do. Now, it's definitely in on the college campus."

"And not a bad way to get a college education, either," adds Bill Serra, director of the College Athletic Placement Service at Ocean, N.J., who says that 20 percent of the athletes he places on college scholarships each year are women.

"The right girl can get everything but her books—almost a full ride. And many of them aren't aware these opportunities exist."

All this has occurred since the Federal Government adopted the Title IX equal rights amendment to the education act in 1972. That bill sent many college administrators into a state of shock but, when the shock subsided two years later, women began to make tremendous strides in campus athletics. And they're expecting much more in the future.

Although it's unlikely many women's sports ever will be self-supporting, some events already have caught on at the box-office and television has shown some interest. In addition, many experts say the new generation of women athletes will have a major impact on United States performances in the Olympic Games. That, in turn, is likely to produce increased popularity of women's sports at the college level.

Nearly 800 Member Schools

The Association of Intercollegiate Athletics for Women (A.I.A.W.), which has nearly 800 member schools in its fifth year as a formal organization, stages national championships in 12 sports—basketball, track and field, cross-country, swimming, gymnastics, badminton, golf, tennis, field hockey, softball, volleyball and skiing. Scholarships at many schools are available in most A.I.A.W. sports plus, in some areas, for such events as archery, fencing, synchronized swimming and even baton twirling.

"The programs are increasing but I don't know how much the A.I.A.W. can take personal responsibility for," says Peg Burke of the University of Iowa, current president of the A.I.A.W. "Certainly the equal opportunity legislation [Title IX] was a big lever there. I also think the fact that opportunities exist for the female athlete to do something and for schools to become as recognized through their female athletes as through their male athletes has been somewhat of a stimulant. But there still is a long way to go."

Title IX is a 37-word Federal proviso that gaurantees athletic rights for women equal to men at institutions receiving Federal funds. No equal rights, no Federal funding.

When it first came about, the National Collegiate Athletic Association and many of its colleges warned that Title IX would bring an end to big-time men's sports if athletic revenues had to be diluted to support women's programs. All agreed that funding women's programs would be a burden on budgets already hit by soaring costs. Those budgets are being trimmed partly by new limitations on men's scholarships, particularly in football, but the financial load still worries college administrators.

Nevertheless, Serra says, many of the same colleges that have solid varsity programs for men—including Alabama and the University of California, Los Angeles—took the lead in scholarships for women athletes.

Alabama, he says, has 105 partial scholarships available for women, and two or more partials may be combined into a full scholarship for a particularly desirable athlete. Dr. West notes Southern Illinois has 108 available. Last year more than 70 were in effect, she says, and "it'll run in the 90's this year." Southern Illinois won the A.I.A.W. gymnastics championship in three of the last four years and offers 10 other sports for women.

Colleges with modest programs for men necessarily have modest programs for women.

Merger With N.C.A.A. Resisted

The A.I.A.W., formed in 1971-72 as an offshoot of another organization that had been involved for many years in women's sports at all levels, so far has resisted efforts by some elements in the N.C.A.A. to take it over. Many in the A.I.A.W. feel it would be a giant step backward if their group were absorbed by the N.C.A.A.

Discussions with an N.C.A.A. committee will continue, says Miss Burke, and she also has announced a summit conference of college presidents at Denver Dec. 5-7 to explore solutions to the growing educational, civil rights and financial problems involving all intercollegiate athletics.

Under A.I.A.W. regulations, the recruiting of women athletes is low-keyed compared to the hectic quest for males. Among other things, the rules forbid such frills as expenses-paid visits to the campus for prospective female athletes. In at least one way, however, she gets a better deal than her male counterpart.

If, at the end of a year, she elects to transfer to another college, she is eligible immediately for competition at her new school, although she must wait a year before accepting another scholarship. Male transfers may not compete for one full year.

Many colleges have taken the obvious route and set up separate departments for men and women athletes. Arizona State, which had a good history of women athletes under its physical education program, is on another tack.

The athletic director, Fred L. Miller, is responsible for both programs. Both male and female athletic teams have the same business manager. An assistant athletic director, Mona Plummer, who is also the swimming coach, handles scheduling and scholarship contracts for the women.

"I suppose it's unusual to have both groups under one director but we felt it was more important to put our dollars into programs, not administrators," says Miller. "We didn't have to hire a lot of extra people. Our coaching staffs and our team practices are integrated in sports involving both men and women.

"Our meets are integrated, too. We have women's events at our track meets and women's events on gymnastics programs. I find they are more exciting than men-only meets but not everyone agrees. We also have adopted the team tennis format for some of our dual meets, playing mn and women on the same team as they do in the professional World Team Tennis league."

Arizona State has about 180 men and 60 women on athletic scholarships this year. When you deduct the football scholarships, roughly half the men's total, the number available to women comes into better balance.

A Lift to Olympic Chances

Miller, Miss Burke and Dr. West feel the boom in women's sports will increase United States medal chances in the Olympic games of 1980 and beyond.

"It will affect the Olympics in a very positive manner," says Miller. "Women are very much accepted now and long overdue."

"It's obvious that it is having an impact already," s Miss Burke. "I was very pleased to see our women's bas ball team win an Olympic silver medal at Montreal. Th were a group of kids that were together only about weeks and all but one were college basketball player

"I suspect club performers in sports like track and fi swimming and gymnastics will continue to dominate for next few years but it can't be long before the col programs and the improved coaching and training op tunities will start making a greater impact. I think see a dramatic improvement in the American spo woman's performance."

Says Dr. West: "I was present at many of the A.I championships in 1975-76 and you wouldn't believe of the performances I saw. It made a believer out of Women athletes are going to be a lot better than we thought they could be."

Fitting Athlete to School

Serra says his placement bureau tries to fit athl scholarship hopefuls into an acceptable geographical and at the level of competition that matches their skill

"Obviously, the blue chip athlete in any major spo male or female—isn't going to come to us," Serra s "The colleges already know about the best ones. We place good male performers in lesser sports at ma schools and, more often, we find places at smaller schi for fringe performers in all kinds of sports. We are pla women in all types of schools in many different spo

He finds men applicants are easier to handle than wom

"The male athlete will bend a little when you tell him may not be good enough to play at the big school thinking about," says Serra. "He'll go to a smaller col maybe in a state he'd never thought about, if it means get a chance to compete.

"Women, some of them, anyway, just won't bend. I one interview with a good track performer who could had a full-ride scholarship at a major school. She asked if, after she got there, she really had to go out for t and all that practice. I told her that was the general id

"What if I find I like field hockey better?" the girl as

Basketball Natural Route For Jan van Breda Kolff

When Jan Van Breda Kolff was young and impressionable, the atmosphere in his home was conducive to playing basketball.

His father, Bill van Breda Kolff, was gaining a reputation as an outstanding coach at Princeton and conversation at the dinner table often centered on basketball. Therefore, it didn't surprise too many people when Jan gravitated toward the basketball court as he was maturing in a healthy 6-foot-8-inch frame.

"To tell you the truth, my father never taught me anything," said Jan, now with the New York Nets. "He didn't push me or try to influence me one way or another. I guess his biggest influence was in terms of exposure. Since he coached basketball, there was always a basketball around the house. The family often went to games together and we watched and talked basketball constantly."

Unlike many fathers who live vicariously through their children's accomplishments, van Breda Kolff, who currently coaches the New Orleans Jazz, fully understood the importance of allowing his son to develop his skills naturally.

No Teaching From Father

"He told me at an early age that he wouldn't be teaching me how to play basketball," Jan told United Press International. "At the time, I guess I was in about fourth or fifth grade. I didn't really understand why.

"But when I began playing organized ball on a higher level, when I got into the eighth and ninth grades and later into high school, I realized that he had used sound judgment.

"He was afraid there would be conflicts of interest. He didn't want to teach me his way and have it interfere with the philosophies of my coaches at school. He felt that would be unfair to me, my coaches and my teammates. I'd have to say he was absolutely right."

Actually, the van Breda Kolffs spent very little time together. Butch frequently went on weekend road trips while coaching in college and later, after he became head coach of the Detroit Pistons in the National Basketball Association, would spend months at a time away from home.

No matter how far the two grew apart physically, however, they grew closer together spiritually. Their mutual respect for each other increased daily.

When the Nets lost to New Orleans, 110-99, Tuesday night, it marked the first time that Jan van Breda Kolff had played against his dad in a regular-season game. Predictably enough, Bill van Breda Kolff was hit with two technical fouls and ejected from the game. Jan didn't fare too well, either, scoring 6 points in 19 minutes and fouling out of the game.

"I've always wanted to play against my dad," said Jan, who averaged 11 points and seven rebounds a game through the early part of the season. "And I've often wondered what it would be like to play on his team."

A graduate of Vanderbilt University, where he played center, forward and guard and earned academic all-America honors as well, Jan van Breda Kolff has been labeled a "defensive-oriented" forward.

Particularly adept at moving without the ball, positioning himself for rebounds and setting picks for teammates away from the ball, van Breda Kolff was obtained by the Nets prior to this season to complement Julius Erving, who has since been sold to Philadelphia.

Mohibullah Khan Brings His Temper To Proper World of Squash Racque

They call him "Mohibullah the Terrible," and they're still not sure whether he's going to be good or bad for the game of squash racquets.

Until now, there has never been room in the fast-moving but courteous world of squash for such tempestuous players as 37-year-old Mohibullah Khan of Pakistan. But Khan has arrived, and the game has its own version of Ilie Nastase.

Like Nastase, his tennis counterpart, Khan is a brilliant player given to sudden and cyclonic outbursts of emotion. He is temperamental and unpredictable, a showman who plays to the galleries as much as he plays against his opponents.

Next Friday, when the three-day Boodles open tournament begins at the Uptown Racquet Club, 151 East 86th Street, Mo Khan will be one of the favorites in the $8,000 event. Another member of the famous squash-playing clan from Pakistan, Sharif Khan, is the top-seeded entrant. But Mo Khan, if he can control his temper, is capable of beating anyone, including his top-ranked cousin.

Mo has won four North American open titles, and two North American professional championships. But he is best known for his unruly antics on the court, a situation that also applies to Nastase.

For more than 100 years, squash has been a cultured, refined game in which obscenities are seldom hurled, tempers rarely flare and poise is rarely lost. All this is changing under the impact of Mohibullah the Terrible, the bad boy of squash.

Khan's anger may be directed anywhere: at fans in the gallery, at officials, at his opponent. He screams and shakes his fist, and walks off the court. He mutters to himself, or glares menacingly at his rival. Then, as the mood passes, he smiles at the gallery and tries to win it back.

In a sport where positional advantage is important, Khan's temper frequently flares when he is challenged for control of the 32-foot-long, 18½-foot-wide court. He has been known to challenge a rival verbally, nose to nose.

In this respect, opponents of Nastase have an advantage: there's always a net between them and Ilie.

But Khan has his admirers, too. According to some of the tour regulars, pro squash needs all the fire it can get.

Coach of Pepperdine Fi Another Georgian on Mo

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 13 (UPI)—Like Jimmy Carter, the Pepperdine basketball coach, Gary Colson, grew up in a small Georgia town. He never met the nation's President-elect but he knows all about peanuts.

"My accent is back in," Colson grinned. "I was raised in Dasher and that's about 60 miles north of Plains. Hey, Plains is a big city compared to Dasher. Dasher is so small that it's only there three days a week. There's no way you can find it on the map.

"Did you ever have boiled peanuts? You put all these peanuts in a big pot and load it up with salt. Then you cook them all night. They really taste good."

After coaching basketball for 10 years at Valdosta (Ga.) State, Colson came West to Pepperdine in 1968.

Waves Finished with 22-6 Mark

Although Pepperdine lost Dennis Conference race and finished with a 22-6 won-lost record last season. They handed Jerry Tarkanian's high-powered Nevada-Las Vegas team one of its two defeats.

The Waves upset University of San Francisco in the West Coast Athletic Johnson to the Seattle Supersonics and the Brazilian star, Marcos Leite, to Italian professional basketball before their eligibility was up, Colson is optimistic. Maybe it's the view from the scenic Malibu campus, picturesquely situated where the Santa Monica Mountains reach the Pacific Ocean.

The Omni in Atlanta is the site of the 1977 National Collegiate basketball championships. Colson, of course, still has many close friends in Georgia.

The Waves have two starters back—6-foot-6-inch Ollie Matson, a forward, and 6-3 Flintie Ray Williams, a guard—from the club that won the school's first conference basketball title in 14 years.

William Is the Floor Leader

Matson averaged 14.7 points and nine rebounds while Williams averaged 12.2 points and was Pepperdine's floor leader last season.

"They [the Pepperdine players] know they can play with San Francisco and U.C.L.A. now," Colson said. "Some people might disagree but there's not that much difference between Ollie Matson and Marques Johnson [U.C.L.A.'s top forward]. Marques does things Ollie

Allen Fox Busy Putting On Pro Tennis Tour in West

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 13 (UPI)—Allen Fox is his name and tennis is his game. Well, sort of.

Fox doesn't play much competitive tennis these days at the age of 37, but he does spend a lot of time trying to promote the game—or at least his interest in it. He's the principal organizer and founder of the new Western States men's professional tennis circuit.

The winners of the first four tournaments of the nine-week winter tour were, in order, Cliff Drysdale, Marty Riessen, Peter Fleming and Andrew Pattison. Each week, eight players compete in $20,000 tournaments for $8,000 first prizes.

The tour reached San Jose, Calif., this week.

"Charles Pasarell and Erik van Dillen came to me and asked me to help them organize tournaments in the western United States in the winter," he explained. "They pointed out that a lot of players wanted to stay close to home instead of going to Asia and Europe.

Good Reception Reported

"We picked our players by reputation and it's been very competitive so far. You never know who's going to win one of these matches. We expect to have Roscoe Tanner in Phoenix next month.

"We haven't made any money yet but we'll probably make some in the later tournaments and we think we'll make some for the year. The reception has been good. From the beginning, we wanted to take tennis into towns where they didn't have established professional tournaments.

"For example, we would never go into Los Angeles. We want to become a community event."

Winner of the 1961 National Collegiate singles title for the University of California, Los Angeles, Fox now is in the investment banking business here. He pocketed exactly $100—under the table—for winning the Pacific Southwest championship in 1966. It used to be an amateur event.

He'd like to clear up a misconception about tennis players today, though. They're not all millionaires.

"It's a lot more profitable than when I was playing," he said with a laugh, "but it takes a lot of hundreds of thousands of dollars to be a millionaire and only maybe Jimmy Connors and Arthur Ashe are in that class.

"The top guys are making between $50,000 to $100,000 a year or better. That's certainly not starvation wages. But travel costs money and tennis players don't have infinite lives."

After San Jose, the circuit will stop at Newport Beach, Calif., Nov. 26 to 28; Phoenix, Ariz., Dec. 2 to 5; Seattle, Dec. 9 to 12, and Portland, Ore., Dec. 15 to 19. The tour was in Bakersfield, Calif., last weekend following stops at Salt Lake City, Santa Barbara, Calif., and Tucson, Ariz.

"We'll be back next year," Fox promised.

Yarborough Is Nearing First NASCAR Title

ONTARIO, Calif., Nov. 13 (UPI) — When Cale Yarborough was 11, his father was killed in a plane crash.

Unlike the five-time NASCAR king, Richard Petty, Yarborough didn't inherit a race car. He bought his first car for $50 when he was 13 and—with the help of his two younger brothers—rebuilt it for racing.

The tragic death of his father, a Timmonsville, S.C., farmer, hit hard. But, he says, it made him more determined than ever.

Yarborough, 36, will wrap up his first NASCAR Grand National crown when he starts in Junior Johnson's Chevrolet in the Los Angeles Times 500 at the Ontario Motor Speedway next week," he said. "You know, it hasn't been easy for me. I started out as a farm boy. None of my family was ever in the racing business so I had to work my way up from the bottom.

Forced to Work Hard

"After my dad was killed, my mother worked very hard. We all had to work. But we kept the farm going and we managed to survive.

"Winning the championship means an awful lot to me. It means more to me than Richard because I've never won before and he has. I did just about everything in the racing business to get a start.

"When I finally did get a hold I just I never wanted to let it go. This means

He was virtually assured stock car racing's prized Winston Cup title last Sunday by finishing fourth in the Dixie 500 at Atlanta International Raceway, while Petty dropped out after 157 laps because of engine failure.

It was an especially big week for him. Two days after the Dixie 500, he was re-elected to a second four-year term as a Florence County councilman. The first time he ran as a Republican, the second as a Democrat.

Worked Two Years for Carter

And Jimmy Carter was elected President. Yarborough worked two years for Carter's election as his aide and was at the Presidential victory party.

"I changed parties because of Jim- was governor of Georgia. I know what kind of man he is and what kind of job he can do for this country.

"I enjoy politics but I don't know if that's in my future. It's too far ahead to speculate. Right now racing is what I do best."

Between the Dixie 500 and the Times 500, Yarborough planned to be as careful as he could. There's only one way he can't win the Grand National title and that's not to be able to start here next weekend.

Even if he isn't able to qualify his Herb Nab-prepared Chevy, he could start in another driver's car — under NASCAR rules—in the stock car finale of 1976.

"I'll be trying to win this one," he

Transfers Aside, Rutgers, St. John's and Hofstra Shape Up as Five

By SAM GOLDAPER

Reggie Carter and Bernard Rencher wore second-team blue jerseys as they scrimmaged. When Carter drove to the basket, penetrating through a mass of first-team red jerseys for a layup, Coach Lou Carnesecca of St. John's smiled and said, "It's nice to have guys like that in the ice box."

Carter and Rencher were once two of the finest high school backcourt basketball talents in the nation. During their playing days, Carter, at Long Island Lutheran, and Rencher, at Mater Christi in Queens, were treated royally by recruiters. Carter went to the University of Hawaii and was the Rainbows' top scorer (16.6) as a freshman. Rencher spent his freshman year in a less spectacular fashion at Notre Dame. Now they have returned home, but as transfer students they are ineligible to play this season.

There are returnees like Carter and Rencher on college rosters throughout the New York metropolitan area. They are blue-chip talents who go away thinking stardom and come back disillusioned.

"These kids go away for a weekend," said John Kresse, Carnesecca's chief recruiter, "and they are met by governors, wined and dined and put up in the best hotels. They think it's going to be that way for the next four years. Instead, they quickly return to reality when they find out it's not that way every day."

New Recruiting Tactic

During the last four years, the flow of transfers and the availability of ready-made talent from the junior colleges have altered the methods of recruiting in these parts. Local college coaches, rather than try to compete with inducements offered the local high school standouts, have learned to let the schoolboys go, wait for unhappiness to set in and then welcome their return.

"There was a time when we had no limitation on scholarships," said Carnesecca. "Now we are only permitted 16 basketball scholarships over a four-year span and it goes down to 15 next year. A coach has to be more selective and hold back a few in the event the blue-chippers get homesick. The scholarship limitation is better for the game. It's going to stabilize the game because we will be sharing the wealth. Before, coaches would offer free rides just to prevent players from going to other schools."

Metropolitan area teams enjoyed widespread national acclaim last season as Rutgers, Hofstra, St. John's and Princeton gained berths in the 32-team National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament field, while St. Peter's competed in the National Invitation Tournament. Transfers like Cecil Rellford of St. John's and Bernard Tomlin and John Irving of Hofstra played key roles in the success of their teams.

Following is an outlook for 11 major metropolitan area teams:

Rutgers

During the Scarlet Knights' dream season, Coach Tom Young said, "Every kid wants to play the way we play. They want to get the ball as quickly as possible and score again." Even with the graduation of Phil Sellers and Mike Dabney, the return of Ed Jordan, Jim Bailey, Abdel Anderson and Hollis Copeland are enough to carry out the Young philosophy of quick-at-hand and fast-of-foot offense and a harassing, pressing defense.

Jordan, the best guard in the area, has outstanding anticipation and quickness. Neither the 6-foot-9-inch Bailey nor the 6-8 Anderson give the appearance of being intimidators, but both are solid leapers. They, along with the 6-6 Copeland, who is all legs and arms and a good leaper, will provide Rutgers with a strong inside game. Additionally, Young has Mark Conlin and Rodney Duncan for the backcourt, Steve Hefele, a 6-5 swingman, and 6-7 Todd Milligan. Duncan averaged 28.8 points for Germantown Academy in Philadelphia and Milligan 26.4 at Rutgers Prep.

Cecil Rellford
St. John's

Rutgers is building a 7,500-seat gymnasium, scheduled to open next season. The Scarlet Knights will be playing in the newly organized Eastern Independent League, along with Massachusetts, Villanova, George Washington, Pittsburgh, Penn State, West Virginia and Duquesne. The league is divided into two divisions and the winner of the playoff at the Palestra in Philadelphia will receive an automatic N.C.A.A. bid.

St. John's

The Redmen have been strengthened by transfers ever since Billy Paultz, currently the center for the San Antonio Spurs, found his way to St. John's from Pennsylvania seven years ago. While Carter and Rencher will solve the future backcourt problems, Carnesecca's immediate need is for a playmaking guard to complete the backcourt with the fine-shooting Glen Williams. The probables for replacing Frank Alagia, who was voted the best under 6-footer in the nation last season, are Billy Clarke and Tom Calabrese. Their development will help write the St. John's success story.

The Redmen have an overpowering front line that has been bolstered with the addition of Paul Berwanger. George Johnson, the 6-7 blue-chipper, who played center and forward last season, goes well with the beefy 6-6, 225-pound Rellford, who likes to bull his way inside and hit the boards hard. Johnson played some center last season while the 6-10 Tom Weadock learned to throw around his frame. With the 6-11 Berwanger, Johnson can remain at his more natural spot of forward. Berwanger showed well two years ago playing for Boston College in the N.I.T.

The reserve strength of Rudy Wright, 6-7, Wayne Hall, 6-8, Kevelin Winifree, a 6-5 swingman, Ralph Menar and Gordie Thompson is good. "How good we are," said Carnesecca, "will depend on time. Some guys mature as they play."

Hofstra

The entire campus clamored with enthusiasm last season after Hofstra gained an N.C.A.A. berth. There were pep rallies on campus and one professor even postponed an examination. The Flying Dutchmen start this season with a similar spirit as five busloads of students are pledged to accompany the team to Philadelphia for the Temple game. All because the Dutchmen figure to have a top-notch season and are the preseason favorite in the East Coast Conference.

After 20 games last season, the Dutchmen were mired at the .500 mark and a repeat of previous seasons loomed, seasons when they opened with great hopes and came out with more losses. But in the final nine games the talent surfaced because they had finally learned togetherness.

Coach Roger Gaeckler has four starters back, Richie Laurel, who averaged 20.3 points and almost seven assists, the 6-10 Irving, the nation's third best rebounder (14.6), the bulky Pat Cammerer and Kenn Rood (15.4), who is a deadly shooter. Also back are Willie Vickers, Mark Jenkins and Gary Melillo on my wife's face Gaeckler was able to keep some of the top Long Island talent at home in 6-10 Bryant Loftin, 6-4 Brian Appel and 6-9 Jack Barry. Additionally, he has the 5-11 Henry Hollingsworth, Carter's backcourt mate at Hawaii last season, waiting for eligibility approval.

Columbia

Jeff Combs, a starting guard, while watching the Lions' freshmen play last season, said, "To know that this is the last year we're going to have to lose, is very exciting." Columbia may not yet be ready to challenge for the Ivy League title, but with the infusion of Ricky Free, Juan Mitchell and Alton Byrd, it is ready to forget the 4-20, 4-22 and 8-17 records of the last three seasons.

The 6-4½ Free, an all-city standout, Boys High, Class of 1975, averaged 22 points and 16 rebounds for a freshman team that won its first nine games and finished 12-6 after injuries struck. Mitchell, 6-5, is the power forward who will team with Free. Byrd, a 5-8 guard, is described by Coach Tom Pender as "a wonderful ball-handler, the key to the club. He is quick, and a colorful player, much like Calvin Murphy of the Houston Rockets."

The young sophomores join two holdovers, Elmer Love and Combs. Love, the 6-6 center, averaged 15 points and was the league's top rebounder. He will not play the post, though, because Pender will have his team running and pressing. Mike Wilwhite, George Benz, Dave Hassan and Shane Comer are the top reserves. Columbia still lacks the big man and Pender jokingly says, "I tried to buy one, but there was none in the store to go with our academic standards."

Fairfield

One of the youngest and tallest front lines in the East last season also was one of the slowest as the Stags struggled through a 12-14 season. Coach Fred Barakat went shopping for quickness, in what he calls "an outstanding recruiting year," and he thinks he has found the remedy.

Barakat landed Kim Fisher and Flip Williams, blue-chip guards, and Daryl Strickland and Barry Gunderson for the front line. Fisher averaged 24.1 points for Essex County (N.J.), which was beaten in the final of the National Junior College tournament. The 6-3 Williams was one of the mainstays of Neptune (N.J.) High, which in 32 games lost only in the Group IV New Jersey State championship final.

Joe DeSantis
Fairfield

Fisher and Williams should go well with two holdovers, Joe DeSantis and Ken Brown. DeSantis was selected New England rookie of the year last season after he averaged 16.8 points a game. Strickland and Gunderson, each 6-6, will give quickness to a physical front line of Mark Young and Mark Pleka, each 6-10, and Steve Balkun, 6-8½.

Manhattan

Ricky Marsh and Steve Grant are among four starters back for the Jaspers, who split 28 games last season. The 6-3 Marsh, with an uncanny knack of twisting his body to get free inside the lane, averaged 14 points and five assists. The 6-7 Grant has been moved from center to forward, with Mike Bruno, a 6-9, 220-pound sophomore, 20 pounds heavier than a year ago, replacing him in the middle. Bruno's development into a quality center will be the determining factor for Manhattan.

Grant averaged 23 points in the last six games to raise his season average to 14 points. He also averaged 10.2 rebounds and blocked 71 shots. Dick Pope, a defensive specialist, will be the other forward, while Coach Jack Powers must choose from among Tom Courtney, Chris Dye and Guy Pelley the one who will team with Marsh.

Pelley averaged 12 points and nine assists for the Long Island Aggies and was named to the all-region all-star team. The Jaspers need bulk in the front line, but for that they will have to wait until next season for Karl Luechau (6-8, 220) and Steve Steckel (6-8, 200), transfers sitting out the season. Levurtus (Dino) Larry, 6-5, out of Poughkeepsie High, is Powers's best recruiting catch.

Fordham

When Dick Stewart, the Oregon assistant coach, was named the Ram coach last April, he said, "I didn't come 3,000 miles to lose." Losing may not be in the 28-year-old Stewart's eventual future, but his first season in New York figures to be a struggle.

"Obviously any transition is difficult," said Stewart. "They have to learn a new system, my system, defensive aggressiveness, and we're not blessed with great talent. Realistically, we should be underdogs in 99 percent of our games."

Stewart has 11 holdovers, but little height. T. K. Tripucka, 6-7, is his tallest player, and the schedule, as usual, is too tough for the talent. Also, Stewart arrived too late to get involved in recruiting.

"Our recruiting is as rock bottom," said Stewart. "A lot of doors are not open to us, and we're not well received. We're going to have to do a selling job and convince people we can be a winner again."

Tripucka and Stan Frankowski, a 6-foot guard and the leading scorer last season, are the mainstays. John O'Neill, who sat out last season, Bill Lombardi, a walk-on freshman, and Hector Baez (6-4), who was ineligible after eight games last season, figure to help.

Long Island U.

Nate (Foots) Revels, the Blackbirds' leading scorer (19.2), is gone. In his place is Nate (Angles) Revels, who averaged 20 points and 10 rebounds for Johnson County (Kan.) Community College. The younger Revels is one of seven newcomers, four of whom are college transfers. Another junior college transfer is 6-4 Humberto Roberts, a 29-point scorer at Northeast A. & M. in Oklahoma. Kim Malcolm and Chris Gregory, backcourt men, sat out last season after coming the L.I.U. from Middle Tennessee and St. Michael's in Vermont, respectively.

Coach Paul Lizzo recruited three high school players to go with the seven holdovers from last season's 15-12 team. Chris McMahon (6-8) and Larry Vitelli were cogs on a 17-3 St. Francis Prep team, and Robert Baldassari (6-7) played at North Bergen (N.J.).

Lizzo will attempt to blend some of the new and old talents. Mike Hayes, the playmaker, and Bill Rose will again form the starting backcourt, and Jerry Hughes returns at forward. But the solution rests with how quickly the new talent develops and how good Jeff Wilson (6-7) and Greg Winston (6-8), holdover centers, turn out to be. The Blackbirds are young, they lack bulk up front and the schedule is tough.

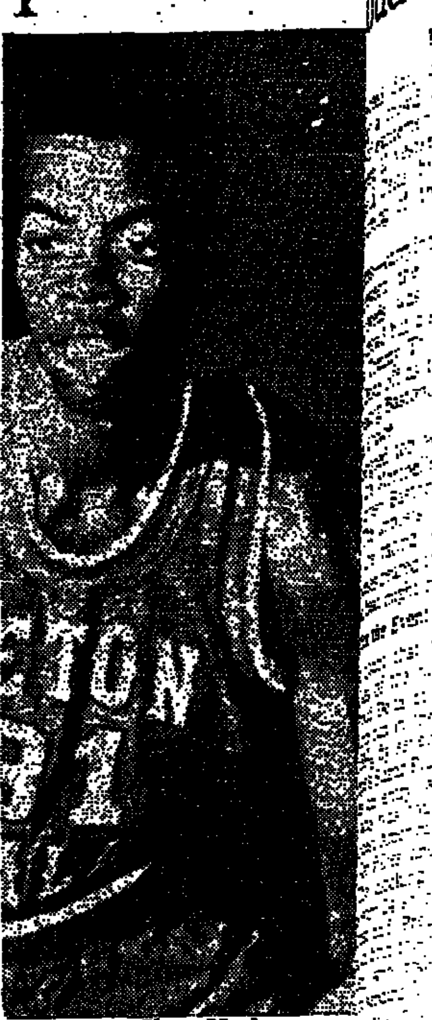
Princeton

Pete Carril is quick to answer, "Penn is the favorite." The Quakers may very well regain the Ivy title, but it won't be without a battle from Princeton. Carril is normally a pessimist with an ability to establish his team as the underdog.

Much of the Tigers' success is Carril's coaching. He is a perfectionist. His former players in the pros have said: "When he sees a flaw he never lets up. He'll harp away at the guys till they do it right. You'll never find a Princeton team that is not among the best defensively in the nation."

That's even true about the 12-6 freshmen team that Carril is counting on to fill the gaping holes left by graduation. The yearlings limited the opposition to 52.9 points a game. The prize of that team is the highly recruited Bob Roma (6-8). He was as good as advertised last season when he averaged 18.5 points and 9.8 rebounds.

Frank Sowinski and Bob Slaughter are starters back from last season's 22-5 team that included 14 league victories. Also returning are Bill Omeltchenko, the first substitute in the backcourt, and Bob Kleinert, the first replacement at forward. Doug Snyder, Rich Starsia and Rich Rizzuto are the other holdovers, but the real help will apparently come from Roma and the other sophomores, Tom Young (6-11), John Lewis (6-4) and Tim Olah, 6-0.



Glenn Mosley
Seton Hall

Seton Hall

The Pirates have the finest big [illegible] in the area in Glenn Mosley. After [illegible]ting out eight games last season [illegible] cause of a recruiting violation, t[illegible] 8½ Mosley averaged 18.1 points [illegible] 13.8 rebounds. St. Peter's

The Peacocks are still bemoanin[illegible] loss of Adams Solomon, the 6-7 [illegible] who left school last June to [illegible] himself to a religious sect. He [illegible] 16.4 scorer and their best rebo[illegible] Coach Dick McDonald must hop[illegible] either John Demby or Larry B[illegible] both sophomores, can mature q[illegible] enough to fill the gap. Wagner, Siena, Army, F.D.U., and Iona Set Higher Basketball Goa[illegible]

By AL HARVIN

Among the Division I colleges seeking basketball prominence in the East this year are two newcomers and three once-strong teams trying to make comebacks.

One newcomer is Wagner, where 27-year-old P. J. Carlesimo, oldest son of Peter, the Fordham athletic director, is the new head coach. P.J.'s goal is to build the Grymes Hill Seahawks of Staten Island into a team that one day will rival Fordham. The other is Siena in Loudonville, N. Y., near Albany, a major basketball school a couple of decades ago. Both are in Division I for the first time.

Army is among the old-timers on the comeback trail. Mike Krzyzewski, a former player, assistant and disciple of Indiana's Bobby Knight, who coached the last good teams at West Point, brought the Cadets halfway back from oblivion last season. He converted a 3-22 won-lost record to 11-14 in his first year.

Another is Fairleigh Dickinson, whose comeback last year was tragically stalled by an auto accident that killed one player and seriously injured two others. Then there is Iona, which may have finally arrived in the second year under Jim Valvano, who built programs at John Hopkins and Bucknell before being lured to New Rochelle.

Elsewhere in the Metropolitan area, there's a new conference among the nine City University of New York schools. The Knickerbocker Conference, cut to four schools by the defections of New York Tech and four City University schools, will conduct a tournament and add schools next season.

Division I

Iona

"Bass-ketball" is the name of the sport they've been playing at Iona for the last three years, renamed for Kevin (Big Fish) Bass, the school's 1,400-point-plus career scoring leader, who erased most of the scoring records of Richie Guerin, the Gaels' most famous alumnus. Bass still has a year to play, but while he's been at the school the Gaels haven't had a winning season. Valvano wants him to play on a winner before he graduates. But the rub is that Iona is so deep that Bass may not be starting. "A multi-dimensional motif", is what Valvano calls Iona's depth this year, which means the 6-foot-4-inch Bass may be contributing his 18.7 point-a-game average as a reserve.

St. Francis

Although Lou Rossini, the former Columbia and N. Y. U. coach, didn't lead the Terriers to the heights last season, he did register their first .500 season in nine years. It might have been better if they had not lost Manny Figueroa, 6-8, 210-pound forward, 18.5 scorer, and 9.5 rebounder, with a knee injury. He's fully recovered from surgery and back as a sophomore. Gerard Trapp, 6-4 forward with a 15-point average, may be shifted to guard. Rossini rates him as a shooter with Chet Forte, his star at Columbia.

Army

Krzyzewski was a member of the Cadets last two National Invitation Tournament teams (20-5 in 1967-68 and 18-10 in 1968-69) under Knight and a graduate assistant under him at Indiana. Two years ago Army fell to 3-22, which makes last season's record look better. Gary Winton, 6-5 forward with 1,000 career points (22 points and 10 rebounds a game last season) leads four returning starters. Matt Brown, 6-4 sophomore, averaged 10.6 points and 4.1 rebounds. Also back are Clennie Brundidge, the 6-4, 220-pound sophomore tight end on the football team, and Larry Cuculic, 6-4 junior forward.

Fairleigh Dickinson

It was early in the morning of January 7. The team bus had returned to the campus from the Iona game. Ben Johnson, a freshman swingman, was driving several players home when his car skidded on icy Route 17. Johnson, a 15-point scorer, was killed; Redonia (Red) Duck, 6-5 forward, had serious head injuries, and George Lighty, 6-4 forward, suffered a compound fracture of the left leg and was in a cast nine months. Duck is back for his senior year. Lighty is shooting but probably will not play until next season. Others returning are Scott Edmonds, 6-5 senior forward and an 11.1 scorer and 10.9 rebounder, the leader in both categories, Steve Makwinski, Jay Jorgenson and Seth Greenberg.

Wagner

The Seahawks ran into treacherous waters last season during the middle passage of their three-year march from Divisions III to II to I, under Athletic Director Larry Geracioti. P. J. Carlesimo, who replaced John Goodwin as coach last Easter has two starters back, Earl Rose, 6-4 senior, and Henry Dillard, 5-9 sophomore. Carlesimo, is speaking cautiously about his prospects but hopes to spring a couple of big surprises in two freshmen.

Siena

One of the three starters Coach Bill Kirsch lost was 6-6 Garry Holle, all-Eastern College Athletic Conference player, who also played baseball and was signed by the Milwaukee Brewers. Returning is Nelson Richardson, a 6-6 junior and a 13 point scorer in reserve, and Chris Madden, the 6-5 captain. Newcomers are Jeff Dowdye, 6-4 out of Bishop Loughlin High where he averaged 15 points and 8 rebounds, and Mickey Malone, a sophomore.

City U. Conference

City College

Playing Harvard, Maine, St. Bonaventure, Columbia, Fordham, and in the Youngstown State tournament, the Beavers should find it difficult to equal last year's won-lost record, their most victories since the 1949-50 double-championship team.

They got a bid to the National Division III tournament. They are favored to repeat as City University tournament champions, but they will have to do it without two of their top three scorers, Andy Morrison and Mike Flynn. Back is Richie Silvera, who broke the school's scoring record with 489 points last season.

York College

For a while the city's fiscal crisis threatened to make the Nomads "no-shows" this season, but they're back with all five starters from a team that was runner-up to City College in the City University tournament and also got an N.C.A.A. Division III bid. The star is Walter Murray, 6-4, 183-pound senior, a first-team all-City U. selection who averaged 19.8 points and 9.0 rebounds, and has 1,000 career points.

Baruch

The Statesmen have some fairly good size in 6-6 Jim Barrett, a junior, and two 6-4 starters John Steuer, who averaged 14.9 and 7.9 rebounds and Ken Trush, a transfer from UConn, who played at Francis Lewis High. The new coach is Harvey Jackson, a brother of the St. John's Tony Jackson.

Queens

John Sedlack, a former player, took over a crippled program after Charlie Crawford resigned. He has only one starter at a school, where the men's team recently has been overshadowed by the women's team. The starter is Greg Vaughn, last year's leading scorer and rebounder.

Brooklyn College

The Kingsmen "are basically a young and inexperienced team overall," says Coach Gary Green, despite having four starters returning. Robert Besignano, 6-1 guard, is the only senior back. He's the captain and leading scorer with a 12.5-point average.

John Jay

"This team will surprise in the City U. Conference," says Coach Bob Fox. His only returning starter is Ted Gustus, a junior guard and top assist man. "We have three or four newcomers who balance the team well. Most improved is team defense and shooting."

Hunter

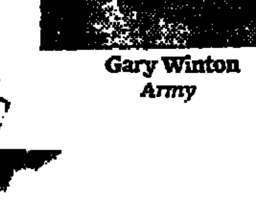
Coach Carlie Jackson's Hawks lost two leading scorers in Bert Lindsay and Guy Hunter, but Daryl Booker, a 5-6 sophomore with a 10-point average, is back. Vic Sims, leading scorer two years ago with an 18.5 average, could be ready at midseason if his grades improve.

Lehman

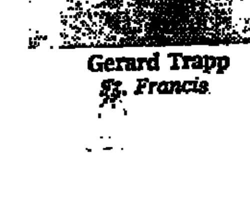
Ted Hurwitz has stepped down from the athletic director's post to coach the Lancers, who will be small but quick. The three returning seniors have been named tri-captains. They are Andre Bullock, Bob Ramos, last year's top stealers, and Greg Jones, leading scorer and rebounder.

Medgar Evers

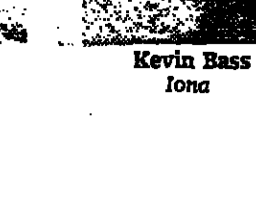
Another new head coach—Randy Martindale—has William Salmond, 6-4 senior, returning. He was the leading scorer among City University teams last year with a 25-point average.



Gary Winton
Army



Gerard Trapp
St. Francis



Kevin Bass
Iona

Knickerbocker Conf.

Stony Brook

The Pioneers have eight returning lettermen, from a team that was 7-1 in conference play but lost the title to New York Tech. The top men are John Adderley, 6-4 and Wayne Wright, 6-6, both sophomores and Bill Anderson, a 6-11 transfer from Bentley College, tallest player in the school's history.

Pace

The Setters have three returning lettermen but "not one strong rebounder on the team" according to Coach Gene Westmoreland. Much will be expected of two newcomers, Eric Gewirtz and Derrick Jones. Eric is a 6-6 freshman who is expected to start and help off the boards. Derrick Jones, 6-4, probably will be the sixth man, to help clear the boards. The key to Pace's season is Ernest Simons, a returning guard who directs the team.

Pratt

Last year the Cannoneers had their best record in 14 years and Coach Tony Missere is looking forward to improvement. The reasons are Belford Diggs, a 6-2 senior who averaged 21 points and 10 rebounds, [illegible] Brown, 15 points and 14 rebound[illegible] Tom Clyne, who averaged 10 [illegible] and 10 assists as a freshman las[illegible] son.

Yeshiva

No gymnasium, no scholarship[illegible] no time for practice because [illegible] tough academic load, make it ha[illegible] the Maccabees to hang in with [illegible] schools. However, Coach Jer[illegible] Halpert, has four starters back: [illegible] Rosenblum, a 6-4, junior forward, [illegible] a 14-point and 7-rebound av[illegible] Jerry Joszef, Mark Hoenig, an[illegible] Genuth.

Other Metropolit[illegible] Area Schools

Dowling

The Golden Lions from Oa[illegible] L. I. have visited seven countr[illegible] play foreign teams and have rec[illegible] a half-dozen players in previous [illegible] from Scandinavia. Last season [illegible] won the National Association of [illegible] collegiate Athletics District 31 [illegible] and went to the national tourn[illegible] in Kansas City. Bob Kaible, 6-5 s[illegible] 18.1 scorer and 9.1 rebounder, [illegible] leading player back for Coach [illegible] Berg.

Upsala

The Vikings from East Orange, [illegible] set a school record of 20 victorie[illegible] season and won their first E.C[illegible] championship. Gone is Jim Hick[illegible] 6-10 center from the Bronx an[illegible] 12.5 points a game, but back is [illegible] Kirk, a 6-5 senior with a 15.6 ave[illegible] and three occasional starters—Da[illegible] halla, 6-5, senior forward, Bill Fi[illegible] 6-8 senior center and Len Haczyk[illegible] a sophomore swingman.

Adelphi

"Bench strength and exper[illegible] should help us improve on last [illegible] 15-11 record," says Coach [illegible] Kessler, with four of his starters [illegible]

Kings Point

The 6-6 Ennis twins, Mike, a [illegible] scorer and 6.3 rebounder and [illegible] 12.9 and 7.1 plus the 6-7 Bill C[illegible] who sat out last season, give the [illegible] ners a fairly large front line. [illegible] Danny Buckley is deep in swin[illegible] with four, and also has the other starters back.

[B]astonera II Triumphs; Proud Delta Nose Back

By MICHAEL STRAUSS

[In] a head-to-head duel down the [stretc]h that kept a crowd of 27,776 [at a] high pitch of excitement, Ann K. [...]e's Bastonera II yesterday beat [Montp]eiler's Proud Delta by a nose [in th]e 106th running of the Ladies [Handi]cap.

[The] keen contest—carrying a purse [of $]108,700—between the top two [...] thoroughbreds was expected [not on]ly by the crowd but also by the [racing] secretary, Tommy Trotter. The [...]ent Proud Delta off as the 3-to-2 [favori]te while making Bastonera II the [...]$2 second choice.

[Trot]ter had assigned top weight of [...] pounds to the Montpeiler color[...] and had given Bastonera II a [...] of 122. The imposts were so [well fi]gured by the racing secretary [that as] the two horses neared the finish, [it seem]ed a dead heat might result.

Record for the Event

[Ther]e was no doubt that the first [two w]ere the class of the nine-horse [field. T]railing Proud Delta at the end [of the] 1¼-mile trip run in the stakes-[record] time of 2:01⅗ by seven lengths [was Cy]nthia Phipps's Sugar Plum Time. [The la]tter ran as an entry with Ten [Cents] a Dance, who was fourth.

[The r]ace, the oldest American stakes [run e]xclusively for fillies and mares, [starte]d slowly. The clocking for the [first q]uarter was only 24 seconds and [...] for the first half. Proud Delta [was in] command at both these stages. [Jorg]e Velasquez, who rode Proud [Delta,] succeeded in sending his 4-year-[old fill]y to the top early, but she had [some] difficulty leaving the gate. "My [filly] stumbled at the start," said Vel[asquez], "and that may have cost her [the rac]e. The pace was slow and I tried [to ge]t it to keep it slow and save her. [She cer]tainly ran as well as she could."

[Ange]l Cordero, rode the Argentine-[bred B]astonera II, made it evident he [was de]termined to watch Proud Delta [...]. He had his mare traveling [alongsi]de the choice, in second place, [thr]ough the run around the club-[house t]urn and down the backstretch. [It wa]s only when the two lead-[ers hit] the straightaway that the Puerto [Rican j]ockey made his bid for the lead. [He mov]ed alongside and the head-to-[head str]uggle ensued, with Bastonera II [managi]ng to push her nose in front of [Proud Delta]'s at the wire.

3 Sought First Success

[Five o]f the starters in the Ladies [Handica]p boasted at least two stakes [victorie]s apiece. Those without stakes [triumph]s were Ten Cents a Dance, [Pass a] Glance and Hellas II. Of the [trio, o]nly Ten Cents a Dance was [...] off a victory. This 3-year-old [daughte]r of Buckpasser triumphed by [...] over Luxury in an allowance [race] at Aqueduct early this month.

[Proud De]lta showed definite stakes po-[tential l]ast May when she scored two [stakes] triumphs at Belmont over the [...]-mile route while carrying 113 [and ...] pounds, respectively. But after [a subs]equent second-place finish at [Golden] State in the Jersey Belle Handi-[cap, sh]e lost her rider in the Coaching Club American Oaks at Belmont and was temporarily retired.

Pass a Glance entered yesterday's feature with only one triumph in 10 outings this year. That success occurred last February at Hialeah. Hellas II, lightly campaigned, had yet to win in four starts this year as she faced the starter. However, a runner-up finish in her previous outing—in a handicap event at the Big A—evidently encouraged her trainer, Phil Johnson, to enter this daughter of Dark Board.

305 Dates Asked for 1977

A request to the State Racing Association. The dates from Jan. 3 through Dec. 23.

One change in the format from 1976 season is the request that the spring and summer meetings at Belmont Park next year be pieced together to run through to the opening at Saratoga. This step would eliminate the move back to Aqeduct from Belmont prior to Saratoga.

If the request is granted, the Belmont dates for the spring-summer session would start on Monday, May 23, and continue through Saturday, July 30. Then, when the thoroughbreds return from Saratoga, the action, after Aug. 27, would be resumed at Belmont two days later and continue through Oct. 15.

Belmont, therefore, will be the first track to take on the head-to-head thoroughbred racing competition from the Meadowlands in New Jersey. The Meadowlands, scheduled to have harness racing through next July, is expected to remain dark for all of August before introducing flat racing in September.

Davis Heads Field In $100,000 Bowling

CHICAGO, Nov. 13 (AP)—A field of 192 bowlers, including last year's winner, Dave Davis, opens the $100,000 week-long world open on Monday. Davis, an Atlanta pro, won the event last year and finished third the year before.

Other top challengers include Johnny Petraglia of Staten Island, and Earl Anthony of Tacooma, Wash. Petraglia won the World open in 1974 and lost to Davis in the championship match last year. Anthony is the Professional Bowlers' Association's career victory leader with 26 and leads the 1976 money winning list with nearly $100,000. Also in the field are 15 entries from foreign countries.

The 24 leading bowlers will advance to match play Thursday night, Friday afternoon and Friday night. The top five then will participate to the nationally televised final Saturday afternoon.

2-1 Royal Ski Scores; Wine Treasure Is Last trouble with the racing establishment in 1971 over his hidden ownership of Jim French, then a leading 3-year-old.

In the court ruling, the judge stipulated that Wine Treasure should start from the outside No. 10 spot in the gate, so that the original post positions, drawn on Thursday, wouldn't have to be reshuffled. Because of the lateness of the decision, no mention of Wine Treasure appeared in today's Daily Racing Form. Special mimeographed sheets containing the colt's three past performances were distributed to patorns purchasing Racing Forms at this track on the outskirts of Philadelphia.

Wine Treasure didn't arrive on the grounds until early afternoon, after a four-hour van ride from Laurel Race Course in Maryland. He showed early speed in the Heritage. Stalking the pace set by Prince Andrew for half a mile or more before beginning his steady fade from second place to 10th. At 76 to 1, Wine Treasure was the second-longest shot in the field.

"We lost a race," said Vince Preste, a son-in-law of the beaten colt's owner, "but we won a constitutional victory. We won the right to compete."

A Horse for All Courses

Cheevers, Kurtz and John Lenzini Jr., trainer of Royal Ski, won a lot more than the right to compete. In scoring his fourth stakes success, the chestnut colt brought home a first-place purse of $90,000, lifting his earnings to $260,159. His other stakes victories came in the Mayflower at Suffolk Downs, the Timonium Futurity at Timonium (a half-mile track in Maryland) and the Laurel Futurity two weeks ago.

In the Laurel event, he led all the way. Today, Kurtz kept him well off the pace as Prince Andrew, backed down surprisingly to $2.20-$1 compared to odds of $2.10-$1 on the favorite, opened up an enormous lead. Royal Ski, moving from eighth place, was still seven lengths back of Prince Andrew approaching the final bend. Like Wine Treasure, the pace-setter faded, winding up seventh.

Irish Eyes Are Smiling When Macken Is Riding

By ED CORRIGAN

It has been almost two decades since Ireland has produced a rider capable of winning with any degree of consistency on the North American indoor horse show circuit. But when Eddie Macken arrived this year for his first appearance outside Europe, he changed the complexion of the circuit.

Horse Show News

Macken, who is 27 years old, finished as co-individual champion of the Washington International show in Landover, Md., and won the title outright at the National Horse Show, which wound up a six-day run in Madison Square Garden last Sunday.

It's not the riders," said Macken the other day before heading for Toronto and the Royal Winter Fair show, the final event on the circuit. "The good horses for the most part are sold to riders in other countries."

Macken is tall, fair-skinned and has been around horses all his life. Right now he lives in Bremen, West Germany, where he does most of his riding.

"You know," he said, "the horse industry is one of the biggest in Ireland. The officials are interested in making some money. If we manage to keep some of the good horses, that's fine. But the commercial value of a horse is more important than getting it on an international team.

"As for me, I live in West Germany because the riding opportunities are better there for me. It's difficult for a professional at home to make it. But I'm still going to go back home in another year or two.

"I live near Paul Schockemoehle, the great German rider, and we've done a lot of work together. I've enjoyed my trip, but, of course, I'd like to be home."

Macken always had been eligible for the Irish Equestrian team, and, for that matter, has been riding on it for several years. But he's always begged off when it came time to make the North American indoor fall circuit.

Macken was the co-leading rider, along with Kevin Bacon of Australia, in the international division at the Washington International show. Ireland finished as runner-up to the United States Equestrian Team in the team race.

At the National, the U.S.E.T. won the title, with the Canadian Equestrian Team second and Ireland third. The Irish team, while piling up four third-place finishes and one second-place ribbon, mostly as a result of Macken's efforts, did not win a class until the end.

Macken, in fact, was involved in a Four-way tie for the lead going into the last class. But he rode Boomerang to victory and clinched the leading rider title and became the leading foreign rider as well.

"I knew the pressure was on me," he said. "But there wasn't much I could do about it. I had confidence in Boomerang, but, of course, I was nervous. I was nervous every step of the way."

Macken was the only civilian rider on the Irish team, which traditionally is made up of Army officers.

Macken has been a regular rider with the Irish team since 1970. He turned professional in 1973 and said the main reason he never had made the North American fall indoor circuit before was that there was better competition in Europe.

This could be translated to mean that there was more money to be won in European shows for a professional.

"Besides the good competition I'm getting in Germany," Macken said, "I have a sponsor and that's important. He is Dr. Herbert Schnapka. He owns a lot of horses and he's an enthusiast. I met him through Schockemoehle.

"Some of the other riders in Ireland were not too enthused at the thought of my leaving, but I made it clear to them that I had to leave to get some experience and that I'd be back eventually.

"It's tough for a professional to make a living in Ireland. Right now, I'd say there are only a handful of professionals there."

Macken started riding at his father's farm, not far from Dublin, and said he never really took part in junior competition.

"The most important thing that happened to me," he said, "probably was the fact that I went to Dublin to ride with Iris Kellerum, who won the European Ladies championship in 1949.

"She had some good horses and I stayed at her place for six months. She also was close to the members of the Irish Equestrian Team, so they knew about me. I never really had to try to call myself to their attention."

Macken and his team will head for home when the Royal Winter Fair show ends next Saturday.

Balbuena of Spain Takes Moroccan Golf by 3 Shots

RABAT, Morocco, Nov. 13 (UPI)—Salvador Balbuena, 26 years, of Malaga, Spain, shot a final-round 75 today to win the sixth King Hassan II golf tournament on the Dar Es Salam course, marking the first time a European has won the competition.

Balbuena had a four-day total of 289 for a three-stroke victory over a trio of Americans, George Burns, Curtis Strange and Danny Edwards. Burns could manage only a 74 on the final round while Strange and Edwards had a 73 each. Two more Americans, Billy Casper and Ron Cerrudo, were fourth and fifth, respectively. Casper finished with a 75 for 294 and Cerrudo had a 74 for 295.

Katz, 26 years old, earned three varsity letters from 1969 to 1971 on Eli swimming teams that compiled a 41-1 won-lost record and won two Eastern Seaboard championships. Since 1972 he has worked as a transportation engineer for the state of California.

Keystone Pioneer Breaks Trot Mark for 1⅛ Miles

INGLEWOOD, Calif., Nov. 13 (UPI)—Favored Keystone Pioneer raced to her ninth straight victory last night as she set a world record for 1⅛ miles in the 22d renewal of the $109,800 American Trotting Classic at Hollywood Park. The 4-year-old mare, driven by William Haughton, took the lead on the first turn and never relinquished it, completing the race in 2:12 3/5 as she defeated last year's champion Savoir, by 1¼ lengths.

Earl Laird held the previous record of 2:13 2/5, set in the 1966 running of this trotting classic.

The crowd of more than 15,000 installed the daughter of Hickory Pride as the 3-5 favorite and she returned $3.20, $2.80 and $2.60 for $2 across the board. Savoir paid $4.60 and $3.40, and the European champion, Equileo, finished third, paying $3.80.

Ward Sees Need for Czar To Steer Racing's Future

By PHIL PASH

"I'm afraid that if I were to speak out, I would have to be very critical of the direction that auto racing is going these days," said Roger Ward, a two-time Indianapolis 500 champion. "The sport is not reaching its fullest potential because there are too many people in control who are small and petty, and it just breaks my heart that an organization like USAC [United States Auto Club] isn't taking the lead and doing something about it.

About Motor Sports

"It is very difficult for an organization like USAC to accomplish anything because you have rule by a board of directors. You can't have competitors writing the rules because they will try to write them in their favor.

"What is needed," said Ward; "is one-man rule over the entire sport—not just USAC, but all phases of it. I think that's why NASCAR [National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing] is so far ahead of USAC, so far ahead that it isn't even funny anymore.

Indy 500 Is Savior

"NASCAR has had one-man rule since it was started, and it's way ahead of any other sanctioning body in this country. USAC is lucky that it has Indy, because without it, they wouldn't last 30 days."

The idea of a commissioner (czar, if you will) to control all motor racing in the United States is not a new one. Some people have been advocating it for more time.

"I've been in favor of it since 1960," said Ward, "and when I first brought it up, people thought I was nuts. Now, a lot of other people are saying the same thing.

"One man at the top is badly needed. Then you give each of the sanctioning bodies an area—NASCAR the stocks, USAC all open-wheel cars, S.C.C.A. [Sports Car Club of America] all sports car and road racing. Right away, that eliminates a lot of conflict and overlap."

One-Man Rule in IMSA

In his plan, Ward did not mention the International Motor Sports Association (IMSA), and there can be little doubt that it must be included. It is closer to the NASCAR scheme of things than USAC or S.C.C.A. because it has one-man rule, and it was launched with NASCAR help.

"Democracy is fine for the country, but auto racing needs a dictatorship. I really believe the sport has been hurt and gone downhill in recent years because of decisions to satisfy certain people or groups. The decisions were not made with the best interests of the sport at heart."

Ward isn't campaigning for the job, even though he might make a good commissioner. "A lot of people are going to think that I'm trying to grind an ax," said the 1959 and 1962 winner of the Indy classic, "but I'm not. I care what happens and I think the decision-makers are incapable of seeing what's happening to the sport. Maybe day I'll write a book about it all."

Ward retired from major comp in 1966 after an outstanding career. A year or so ago he a stock car and he occasionally petes in West Coast races—at t of 55.

"As a car owner, I'm very c and if my driver doesn't drive t I want him to, I'll tell him to g and I'll take over. I have wou driving it a few times, but it as a lark.

"I am able to compete on a level, but if I were to start around on a bigtime basis, it be a lot tougher. Besides, enoug ple already think I'm in my childhood with this car.

"You can definitely say tha not plan a full-scale comeback a lot of respect for today's d They are better educated and m telligent than in my day, and th really some fine drivers around."

Ward also is working on putti gether a series of diesel truck races for the 1977 season. "I got into promoting one in Ontario, and 13,000 people showed up. we're working on a 10-race serie events on both coasts."

Radio Misuse, on Rise, Called Sea Peril

By JOANNE A. FISHMAN

Marshall McCluhan, where are you? Our mediums are cluttered, and "good buddies" are messing up our messages. In fact, the growing use and abuse of VHF-FM marine radios threaten the emergency communications on which lives at sea may depend according to a marine electronics executive. When double-sideband (AM) radiotelephones become obsolete Jan. 1, recreational boatmen will be relying on VHF-FM for short-range and the single sideband (AM) for long-range communications. The problem with double sideband was that, with all the background noise, interference and limited channels, it was difficult to get a message through. And that's still the problem—even with VHF-FM.

News of Boating

"More people are competing for the same air space," says A. Newell Garden of Raytheon Company. Garden is chairman of the Radio Technical Commission for Marine Services, a volunteer task force that has surveyed the manner in which VHF-FM is being used.

According to Garden, an official of the Federal Communications Commission monitored Channel 16, the VHF-FM international distress channel, in western Long Island Sound over the Labor Day weekend.

"In one two-hour period, not a single call was completed; before communications could be established, someone else jumped into the dead air and attempted a new conversation, which also went unanswered," Garden says.

Big Change Began in 1972

Although the switch to VHF-FM and single sideband was agreed to at an international telecommunications conference in 1968, the changeover did not begin in earnest until the five-year phase-out for the old radiotelephones started in 1972. For instance, there were 20,000 marine VHF-FM licenses in force in 1970, says Garden, and now there are 250,000 licenses, with 2,000 being issued each month. While the changeover provided much of the impetus for this boom, the citizens'-band-radio craze also helped.

"When the motorist who was hooked on C.B. turned seaward, he brought his C.B. with him and then moved up to VHF," Garden says.

And, as C.B. users move up to VHF, they bring their own language. The task force reported a "concern for the gradual deterioration in the conduct of radio communications . . . ."

"It is now quite common to hear an anonymous microphone talk-switch triggered in an attempt to shorten someone else's conversation, or hear the C.B.er's opening gambit, 'Breaker, breaker on this here Channel 16, good buddy,' " the task force continued. And Garden explains:

"Interruption of calls is common in C.B., where trivial conversations are legal and a way of life. But on the marine radio band an interruption could endanger a ship."

The survey found that the misuse of Channel 16 was the most common complaint about VHF. Channel 16 should be used only to initiate calls to the Coast Guard. Once initiated, the broadcast is switched to Channel 22, to keep 16 clear. Garden favors making Channel 22 mandatory on VHF-FM sets. He says:

"Channel 16 must serve as a lifeline in emergencies on the water. Its use for anything but emergencies and brief initial contacts diminishes the effectiveness of the entire safety communications system."

The task force hopes education will help change the situation. But for "hard-core cases something has to be done by F.C.C. enforcement," Garden says.

"Big Brother is listening. The F.C.C. continuously tapes broadcasts at certain monitoring stations . . . and there are some Dick Tracy-type things they can do. There now are radio direction finders that can take bearings on VHF radio equipment and pinpoint a signal . . . ."

John Orr, Michigan's basketball coach, claims he's already feeling the pressure of the high preseason ranking accorded the Wolverines: "I've got hemorrhoids, high blood pressure and a lot of other things wrong with me, and we don't play a game until Nov. 27."

Chris Evert, after losing in the Dewar Cup tennis final to Virginia Wade, for her first defeat since April: "I made five percent of my passing shots instead of my usual 95 percent because I was mentally very weak tonight. I reckon I get that way about two or three times a year."

Puli and Maltese Win Big in Toron

By WALTER R. FLETCHER

In a gardenlike setting, with multicolored mums and green shrubs, the little dogs had their way at the two biggest shows of the year in Canada last weekend. After a puli, the smallest of the herding breeds from Hungary, had taken the 13th fixture of the Metropolitan Kennel Club, a 3-pound Maltese led the parade at the 14th show. Both events were held in the spacious International Centre, near the Toronto airport, and they drew a total of more than 18,000 paid admissions.

News of Dogs

The black, heavily corded dog from Hungary was Kallopusztai Aport, a 5-year-old who is a champion in both the United States and Canada. He's owned by Mrs. Viktor Major of Painesville, Ohio, and was shown by her daughter, Vilma Majoros.

The tiny white toy, Louis Durocher's Ch.Merry Miss Titmouse of Eng, upheld the honor of the country north of the border, for she came from Windsor, Ontario.

The pull had the more impressive record of the two. Apor was best in show at Sherbrooke, two years ago, and last October came through at the big London, Ontario, fixture. In May, he captured the silverware in Lansing, Mich. "Apor was bred by my cousin in Hungary," said Mrs. Majoros, "and was flown to us in 1973. We have shown him 20 times this year and he's been out of the groups only once. He has 10 firsts. We have a dozen pulis and seven are champions."

"He's an exceptional puli," said Mrs. John Marshall Jones of Palm Beach, Fla., after she named him best of the 1,062 dogs. "All the spectators see are the cords but he's beautifully put together under that coat."

The mighty mite from Canada is called Mouse by her owner, a computer analyst who also shows her. "This is her first best in show," continued Durocher, "but Mouse has been knocking on the door for the last three weeks, for she has taken five groups."

Irene Schlintz of Fresno, Calif., who chose the tiny white coat from the field of 1,084, said: "After two days in the ring, she still was showing every minute. She has a beautiful coat and an exceptional top line."

*Best puppy both days was an 8-*month-old Dandie Dinmont, Charlieshope Tom Terrific, owned by Dr. and Mrs. Robert Newhurst of Northboro, Mass. Tom, a pepper-colored pup, was handled by Mrs. Newhurst, w president of the Dandie Dinmon rier Club of America.

In a special ceremony, sponsor Loblaws, one of Canada's leading market chains, the six top group ners of the country for 1975 we hibited. At a dinner, the owne these showcase dogs received a framed head study of the anim addition there was an oil painti each dog, which will be displaye nually at the club's shows. "We eventually to find a permanent for the collection," said Herb Wi Metropolitan's show secretary.

Those honored were Michael son's and Paul Kasbohm's Irish Ch.Dunholm's Finn McCool; Ga Marco's Afghan, Ch.Amberhall ius; Mr. and Mrs. Fred Heal's I man, Ch.Jagermeister's Seven Eleven; Mr. and Mrs. O. Wood, Field & Stream: Hunter Matures

By NELSON BRYANT
Special to The New York Times

WENTWORTH LOCATION, N. H.—A feeling that I will never be more than a mediocre deer hunter, born in me after an empty-handed week in central New Hampshire, grew to maturity during seveal equally unsuccessful days in the bleak northern reaches of the state.

If none of our party, which varied from five to seven hunters, had brought in anything to our wilderness cabin during that last-named period, I would have perhaps been able to cling to the notion that bad luck accounted for my failure, but they shot three deer and two bears.

We do not, I should hasten to say, indulge in the group-hunting deer drive, wherein several members of a party push quickly through a patch of woods believed to hold deer toward other hunters waiting on stand for the quarry.

None of those with whom I hunt enjoys a deer drive, primarily because it seems to miss most of what we regard as the true nature of hunting, the pitting of a man's skill against the animal's wariness. And even if we did favor deer drives, the wild, extensive and mountainous country around Wentworth Location simply cannot be hunted in that fashion. The drive is suited only for relatively small pieces of woodland surrounded by meadows or farmland.

One day when a cold fog enveloped the dark, upper slopes of the mountain I was hunting, I did see what I thought was a deer—I later found its tracks there—slipping through a notch in a ledge above me, but I was not sure of what I was seeing and therefore did not shoot.

On another day when a light snow was on the ground I had a good time following a big buck, who stopped often to tear up a patch of ground, for more than two miles. Toward the end I was getting close to him—his second pile of droppings was still warm when I reached it—but he finally left the open hardwoods and entered a hemlock swamp where I lost his trail because the snow had not been heavy enough to penetrate the thick, green canopy.

I felt rather disconsolate at first point, but my spirits soared when I put up, in that same swamp, six ruffed grouse in 15 minutes and saw two more sitting on the bare, upper branches of a birch before they took wing. In previous years in the region, seeing or hearing three grouse a day had been the average.

Hurrying back to the cabin before dark—having remembered that I had promised to prepare a sea clam chowder for all hands that evening—I found that one of the group, Bill Robes of Etna, N. H.—a man whose curiosity about nearly-lost woodland crafts recently led him to construct a birchbark canoe in the manner of the Indians—had returned early and had kindled a splendid fire in the big woodstove, where he was busy concocting a potion of bear's grease and spruce gum that he vowed was good for everything from waterproofing leather boots to easing muscular twinges. He anointed my boots with it and it proved quite effective, but no one was willing to test its medicinal properties.

Fall Automotive Sales

AMC announces a $253 price reduction on a 1977 Gremlin now listing for only $2995.*

Here's why AMC is taking this action.

For a number of reasons, the small car market has substantially contracted during the last two years.

This has hurt American Motors which is exclusively a small car producer.

Due to increases in costs, small car prices have risen over $1000 in the last five years.

These price increases have driven many small car buyers out of the market place.

In order to convince these buyers to return to the market and look to American Motors, we've reduced the price of the 1977 AMC Gremlin by $253.

What's in it for AMC?

By reducing prices we expect to significantly increase our sales volume to offset the effect of the price reductions. In fact, we are banking on a 30% increase in Gremlin sales.

What's in it for small car buyers?

This reduction in Gremlin price means that now the AMC Gremlin lists for $254 less than Chevy Vega and for $104 less than the Ford Pinto Pony.

The base list prices are as follows:

Gremlin	$2995
Vega	$3249
Pinto	$3099

Compare Gremlin's performance.

Gremlin gives you a 6 cylinder engine as standard equipment for superior acceleration to pass at city or highway speeds. The Pinto and Vega come standard with 4 cylinder engines.

The Gremlin has a wider track for greater stability, and at 2806 pounds Gremlin has more road-hugging weight.

Compare room and comfort.

Gremlin has the greatest overall width for more hip and shoulder room. Gremlin also has the longest wheel base which combined with its wider track and road-hugging weight gives you a smooth, stable ride.

Compare Gremlin's versatility.

The Gremlin is no ordinary 2-door sedan. Only the Gremlin comes standard with a big wide hatch, fold down rear seat and even a carpeted cargo area, making the Gremlin a great small car for people who use a car for more than just transportation.

*Manufacturer's suggested retail price. Destination charges, dealer prep. state and local taxes, other options extra.

BUYER PROTECTION PLAN II:* The most important reason why to buy an AMC.

Why do leasing ads talk about prices instead of leases?

We at Sovereign believe that the monthly price is an important part of auto leasing. But not the only part.

What's even more important is what the price gives you. Or doesn't.

Service can be extra. Extra mileage can be extra. Options can be extra. Wear and tear can be extra. And before you know it, your low monthly price is high.

Leasing on the basis of low monthly price alone, can be a costly error.

The monthly price we quote you is the price you actually pay. Not only is our price a complete price, it's no higher than other companies. In the long run, it's often lower. And for a very simple reason.

At Sovereign, we tell you more than our monthly prices. We tell you all the facts about our services, our Mercedes-Benz cars, and our leases. Because the facts about auto leasing hurt only when you learn them too late.

Challenge Avis.

See if our car service network will work better for you.

Avis has three challenging questions you should ask before you sign any car lease which includes service.

How convenient are the locations? How national is the service network? How good is the service?

After you hear the answers, find out if we can give you better ones. We've got a reputation for trying harder. Make us live up to it.

We Can Get You A Good Price On A Volvo.

Volvos are traditionally purchased by people whose priorities in a car are comfort, safety and intelligence of design.

The car buyer whose priority is "price" often ends up in a lesser car.

But now, both these car buyers can end up in a Volvo.

We're having a once-in-a-decade sale.

Which means you'll not only find prices on Volvos like we've never offered before.

You'll find us ready to give you more for your trade-in than we could ever offer before.

This is not one of those sales where you get a good price on some left-over, stripped down or about-to-be-discontinued model that nobody wants.

You'll be able to choose from a full array of fully-equipped Volvos. 2-doors, 4-doors or station wagons. From either our 240 series. Or from our luxurious Volvo 260 series.

With prices going up on '77 cars, there's never been a better time to buy a new car than now.

So see a Volvo dealer today.

It's the only place we know of where you can go in looking for a good price.

And still come out with a great car.

Ancient India: The Mighty Hindu Temples of the South

By JAMES EGAN

Worshipers crowd the ancient Hindu temple to Siva, God of Destruction, a deity well worth propitiating. The temple elephant rocks from foot to foot in his stall, wearing the sign of Siva on his forehead, three horizontal white stripes. Devotees stream through the courtyard bearing offerings—lotus blossoms, jasmine, coconut and rice. A din rises from within the temple, where two drummers and a leather-winged horn player sound the call to prayer.

Having shed our shoes, my wife and I follow the crowd through echoing halls to the threshold of the inner shrine; only Hindus may penetrate beyond. Here, a senior priest and a junior priest—bare-chested, wearing white dhotis, or loincloths—receive the offerings, lay them before images of Siva and his consort, Parvati, then chant appropriate prayers. The elder priest, spotting us, steps forward to dab our foreheads with white ash, the residue of burned cow dung. The younger suspends an inverted silver chalice over our heads. Both priests invoke a blessing and graciously accept our coins on behalf of the temple. Although strangers, we have participated in a rite as old as India.

South India's early Hindu temples, with their astounding stone sculptures, have been preserved through a fortunate turn of history. The Mogul conquerors of India, like good followers of Islam, swept down from the north in the 16th century, destroying Hindu temples with missionary zeal. Fought to a standstill some 50 miles north of Madras by a coalition of three Hindu kings, the invaders left the temples of the south largely untouched. Thousands stand today: some are archeological sites dating from the 7th century; some are working temples still teeming with worshipers after 1,300 years; some date from as late as the 16th century, painted anew in bright, gaudy colors. To see the India of ancient Hindu temples, we started from Madras, gateway to the south.

Madras lies about two-thirds of the way down India's east coast on the Bay of Bengal. Capital of Tamil Nadu, the southernmost state in India, it is a green and pleasant city of 2.5 million, slower paced than the cities of the north, with wide streets and the longest beach of any city except Miami Beach. But because of resident sharks, strollers instead of swimmers jam the beach on Sunday afternoons.

As a base for exploring the temple towns, Madras offers several good hotels (see box on Page 14) and a fine museum, where we briefed ourselves on temple architecture and the pantheon of Hindu gods and goddesses. Overwhelmed by the complexity of deities, we settled for the Hindu Trinity—Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver and Siva the Destroyer, along with a few close relatives. Vishnu, for one, went through 10 incarnations, first as a fish, then a turtle, then a boar, then a lion; he finally took the human form in his fifth incarnation, as a dwarf; princehood came later.

Of the profusion of temple towns in South India, we chose three major

Ancient Peru: The Mysterious Images of the Nazca Plains

By THOMAS BRIDGES

1927. Toribio Mexia Xesspe, member of a Peruvian aerial survey team, gazes from his cockpit over the endless sameness of the ground below. The desert whiteness has been replaced by brown barrenness as the plane has moved inland, but the monotony of the lifeless coastal terrain of southern Peru remains almost hypnotic. Suddenly there is something. Long lines stretch across the flat tableland between Nazca and Palpa—too many for mule tracks. He makes another run over the area. The ground is covered with straight lines, crisscrossed lines stretching on for miles, plus markings that seem to resemble animals.

Back in Lima Xesspe reports what he has seen. Little notice is taken. The experts are not impressed; ancient irrigation, no doubt.

THOMAS BRIDGES is a freelance writer who is working on a book about Peru.

Not all mysteries are hidden away atop the slopes of unclimbable mountains or within the depths of impenetrable jungles. The markings on the Nazca plains, in fact, lie to the left and right of what is perhaps the best roadway in South America—the Pan American Highway. Getting to Nazca, then, is a matter of a six-to-eight-hour drive from Lima (there is no regularly scheduled air service), and arrangements can easily be made through a tour operator in Lima, which is what my wife and I did.

We begin our trip in the late hours of morning, heading south, leaving the everlasting humidity of Lima—the desert beginning to our left, the Pacific Ocean to our right. The conversation: the driver Carlos's broken English to my broken Spanish; the guide Rolando's almost perfect English to our barrage of questions.

Our black Mercedes zips along the smoothly paved highway, the heat rising. An RC Cola sign rears up in the desolate landscape, a bit of surrealism for our minds to play with—the rest is white desert. "There are lizards the size of your fingers and snakes that are more like worms. Little else," Carlos says.

Scattered chicken farms with glowing metal roofs appear occasionally along the beaches. There are a few uninviting beach resorts. Small towns or an irrigated farm sometimes break the barrenness of white sand. The highway swerves inland from the sea.

Skirting Ica (180 miles from Lima), the large wine-producing area of southern Peru, we are almost halfway there. Green, the white fluff of cotton, leafy grape vines and sugar cane give way to desert again. The influx of traffic that we started to hit around Ica disappears.

Our conversation dwells on Nazca. The day before, on a visit to Lima's National Museum of Anthropology and Archeology, we learned that the Nazca people buried their dead mummified in large ceramic pots. We saw their pottery, polychromic—perhaps the finest color design in all Latin America. It was because of similar figures on the pottery and on the plains that scientists were able to determine that both were made by the same people.

Rolando adds to our knowledge. The civilization is believed to have spanned 300 B.C. to A.D. 700. In about the 15th century the remains were absorbed by the Inca empire. The culture was finally destroyed by the Spanish.

It was an agricultural-based society dominated by warrior and priest classes. Headhunting was practiced. A killer whale, symbol of the headhunting cult, we will see tomorrow on the plains. It has the severed head of a human hanging from its body. Subterranean canals in the area, which carry water from the mountains to small farms during the dry season, are thought to have been built by the ancient Nazca people. Little else is known about them.

Palpa, about 240 miles from Lima, and the last large town we hit before Nazca, appears over a hill.

The road dips into the richness of a green valley. In the town of Palpa there is a line of vegetable and fruit stands—orange, yellow and red fruits basking in the descending sun. Children yell playfully at us in Quechua, the Inca language still used by the Indians.

Donkeys, goats, dogs are left in the dust behind our car. The road rises up by irrigated farms and small villages toward the plateau ahead. The sun is setting as we reach the Nazca plains. Reds in the rock are highlighted. The plains stretch endlessly, bracketed by mountains only in the far distance.

"The markings are all around us now. The highway splits the lizard in half," Rolando says.

We strain to pick up any resemblance to figures. Slightly clearer areas are described as "landing strips (for visitors from another planet?)—others are lines—others are figures. The car stops, and we walk up a small hill next to the road. Rolando is careful to tell us not to step on the markings.

From the hill one "landing strip" clearly visible as a long cleared-away trapezoid extending almost beyond v

Controversy ... Giveaway

Notes: Controversy Over Giveaway Plans

JOHN BRANNON ALBRIGHT

counts and giveaways are stand- devices in many areas of the nomy, but they're a rare and angered species among travel nts. Last year two New York area nts sought to attract customers giveaways, but both programs since been discontinued; the ts say they gave in to "travel stry pressure." Now a New York yer has filed a $75-million class- on suit against the American ety of Travel Agents, the major stry association; a chief target he A.S.T.A. code of ethics that ds members to offer discounts, or rebates on commissions to ts.

artford Holidays of Great Neck, offered color television sets to booking Caribbean cruises on Queen Elizabeth 2. Person-to-Per- Tours of Manhattan offered a ty of gifts to purchasers of travel ages. In both cases, the public's onse was "gratifying," according he owners of the agencies; then the "pressure."

ough neither agency is a member .S.T.A., both feel they were sub- d to the impact of the A.S.T.A. . Dan James, owner of Person- rson Tours, said that the travel stry people he dealt with "fled the devil at the sight of the s" when objections, based on the T.A. code, were raised within the stry.

e New York lawyer, Richard enthal, charges that the code is lation of the Donnelly Act, the of New York's version of the man Anti-Trust Act. He charges A.S.T.A. and all its member agen- in Manhattan conspired to control eliminate competition and that the illegally restricts the freedom of ociety's more than 14,500 member ts, who represent about 70 percent ll travel agencies in the United s. The result of the agents' ad- ice to the code is "artificially high s" for travelers, says Mr. Blumenspokesman for A.S.T.A. said the ty's lawyers were studying the and no detailed comment on the ations would be made until after .A.'s response was filed in State eme Court in New York on Nov. he spokesman did say, however, a "reading of the suit reveals basic misunderstandings about the travel industry, which may have led to the institution of the suit." Ray Hering, A.S.T.A.'s vice president of industrial relations, has expressed the society's position as being one of protecting the profits of its members. "Travel agents operate on a low profit margin, and we are opposed to anything that chips away at that," he said.

TRIPLE NEW YEAR'S EVE

Those who feel one New Year's Eve celebration isn't enough can have three on Dec. 31—each exactly at the stroke of midnight. What makes the triple celebration possible is the Anglo-French supersonic jet plane, the Concorde. Utilizing the Concorde for round-trip transportation, the Encore Marketing Company, Inc., of New York has put together a New Year's tour called Encore III. The tour members will fly from Washington to Paris on Dec. 29 to take part in a midnight revel there two days later. Then they will fly back to the United States, reversing time as they speed supersonically westward, which will give them a second New Year's Eve midnight revel over the mid-Atlantic. Finally, after arriving back in Washington well before midnight Eastern Standard Time, they will attend still a third revel, this one at the French Embassy.

The price of the tour is $4,850 a person and includes round-trip air transportation aboard the Concorde, an overnight stay at the Hotel Inter-Continental in Paris, a night at a Parisian cabaret, a night at the Madison Hotel in Washington and all meals, drinks, champagne and noisemakers. The trip may be booked through travel agents or Encore Marketing, 62 West 45th Street, New York 10036 (tel: 212-575-8686.)

SPECTACLE IN SWITZERLAND

Next summer—probably for the last time in this century—the 17,000 residents of Vevey, Switzerland, will stage their once-in-a-generation Vinegrowers Festival (Fête des Vignerons), a two-week outdoor spectacle of street parades and musical shows with a folklore theme. Participating in four giant parades and in 12 performances of the three-hour musical show in the town's 15,000-seat amphitheater will be 4,000 costumed townspeople and 750 musicians. Half a million spectators are expected during the run of the festival. Previous celebrations in this century were held in 1905, 1927 and 1955. Seats for next year's event, which will take place from July 30 to Aug. 14, are now on sale through the Swiss National Tourist Office, 608 Fifth Avenue, New York 10020 (tel: 212-757-5944). They range in price from $3 for parades to a top of $60 for shows.

SAILING FROM NORFOLK

The cruise ship Kungsholm will sail for the first time from Norfolk, Va., on Jan. 6, offering passengers who board at that port $100 off the rates from New York. The ship will spend 14 days at sea after leaving Norfolk, calling at Trinidad, Barbados, Antigua and St. Thomas. The rates from Norfolk range from $815 to $2,160 a person in double occupancy and include free round-trip limousine service between Norfolk International Airport or the Norfolk Amtrak station and the cruise terminal. Free transfer service is also offered by a number of Norfolk hotels and motels. Details on the Jan. 6 sailing and other cruises from Norfolk may be obtained from the Information and Services Department, Norfolk Port Authority, Norfolk International Airport, Norfolk, Va. 23518 (tel: 804-857-3351.)

WATER HAZARD

A golf course seldom requires Coast Guard approval, but the third and newest course of the Sandpiper Bay resort in Port St. Lucie, Fla., 45 miles north of Palm Beach, did. Called the Wilderness Course, it traverses a body of water officially regarded as navigable and thus under Coast Guard jurisdiction. Approval was required before a bridge could be built over a fishing stream called Pruitt's Cut that separates the first five holes, which are on an island, from the rest of the course—even though the stream is navigable only by canoe or row boat.

Nine holes of the course have been completed. The entire course will be a par-72 covering 6,845 yards. From the third and fourth holes players have a view of an old Indian burial ground. Greens fees are $10 a person, but guests staying at the resort are offered a 50 percent reduction. Rates for accommodations range from $16 to $19 a day a person in double occupancy without meals; with meals the rate is $15.53 a day more per person. Reservations and additional information may be obtained from Sandpiper Bay, Port St. Lucie, Fla. 33452 (tel: 305-334-4400).

LOWER RATES IN MEXICO

As a result of the latest devaluation of the peso—it was worth about four cents a week ago compared to a nickel after it was first floated at the end of August and 8 cents before that—the cost of some travel packages has dropped. Three examples:

American Express is lowering prices of all its tours to Mexico. American Express's one-stop tour charters to Cancun from New York now range in price from $299 to $399; the price had ranged from $339 to $429. The charters depart on Saturdays from Nov. 20 to April 30 and include round-trip air transportation, seven nights

Letters: Carillons That Truly Ring True

To the Editor:

In the article by Robert W. Tolf on Stephen C. Foster, "South's Foster Child" (Travel Section, Oct. 3), the writer has continued to propagate the misconception that there is a carillon in the Stephen Foster Center in White Springs, Fla., along the Suwannee River.

It is time we call a spade a spade and not a heart or club. This carillon is not a true carillon at all. The fact is that it does not have any bells at all—only tubes.

A carillon, by definition, must have real, bronze bells and must have a minimum of two octaves of these bells. The average range of a carillon today is four octaves, and the largest and heaviest carillon today is the one in New York City in the tower of the Riverside Church. It has 74 bells, the heaviest weighing 20 tons.

Our professional organization—the Guild of Carillonneurs in North America—is working diligently to educate the public about our instrument. Imitations and frauds should be labeled as such, and not passed off as the real thing.

WILLIAM DeTERK
Assistant Carillonneur,
University of Michigan
Ann Arbor

[Al Head, the director of the Stephen Foster Center, replies: It is true the carillon at the Stephen Foster Center, built by J. C. Deagan Company of Chicago in 1957, may not technically be considered a true carillon although in layman's terms it does not contradict the generalized definition in Webster's Dictionary of a carillon, and it does have the tonal quality and resounding characteristics of a familiar cup-shaped cast bell. The unique tubular "bells" actually consist of three sets of 32 "bells" with a chromatic scale range from C to G, plus a fourth high-G bell. Three bells sound in perfect unison for each note to produce a strong resonant note response. The tubular bell definitely is a more efficient design for the production of musical tone. However, tubular bells do not permit control of volume by the carillonneur. The tubular shape makes it possible to tune the fundamental note and the four predominant overtones. The five-point harmonic tuning considerably reduces the discordant minor third which causes the sour-note and out-of-tune effect listeners often hear when familiar melodies are played with harmony on cast-bell carillons.]

HUNTERS

To the Editor:

Perhaps Richard O'Mara's emotional account of Ohio deer hunters and children's distress, "A Family Campout: A Hunter, A Deer" (Travel Section, Oct. 24) requires an addendum.

Personally, I could never bring myself to shoot a deer. But every year, on land I own in the Southern Tier, I allow my farmer-neighbors and a few other friends to take 12 or 15 deer. Why?

When I was a farm boy in that area some 60 years ago, there wasn't a single deer to be found in Steuben County. However, they began to migrate from the Pennsylvania mountains in the mid-1920's, being attracted by abandoned farmlands and unharvested orchards. Last year, in that one county, more than 9,000 were killed legally and one can only guess how many more were killed by cars or taken illegally.

If there were no hunting, what would the situation be? I can answer that in my own emotional way. I would be able to take Mr. O'Mara's children into my woods and show them the rotting carcasses of countless deer, dead of starvation. And they could listen to the area's farmers bemoaning the destruction of their corn and other silage crops.

CUTTING COSTS AT SEA

To the Editor:

I found the article by Christopher Wren "Traveling through Scandinavia the Way the Scandinavians Do" (Travel Section, Oct. 24) quite evocative, reminding me of many similar boat journeys in that part of the world.

It was also instructive in that it suggests a way to slow down or even reverse the decline of passenger ship travel. As far as I know, none of those vessels includes the price of food in their passage. Rather, one pays only for transportation, and if desired, sleeping accommodations. For meals, one goes to the ship's restaurants and orders as much or as little as one pleases, paying accordingly.

This not only permits the passenger

It was built ...1767 by Antigua-born Josiah Martin, ...o divided his time between the West ...ies and Long Island.

...ock Hall, a handsome, two-story ...ding, is filled with Colonial an...ues, including some furnishings ...d by its 18th-century occupants. ...ong its notable architectural fea...es is the Chinese Chippendale rail... around the widow's walk atop the ...f where the wives of its owners ...tched for their husbands' ships.

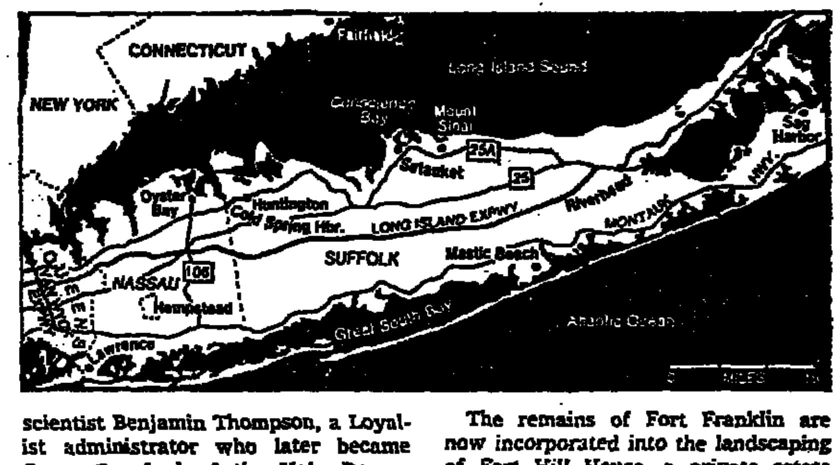
...isitors can get to Rock Hall by ...ing the Van Wyck Expressway to ... Rockaway Boulevard Exit, follow... ... Rockaway Turnpike to Broadway, ...ning right and taking Broadway to ...wrence Avenue. A left turn just be...nd Lawrence Avenue leads to the ...use and parking. Rock Hall is open from April through November, Tuesday through Saturday, from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. and on Sundays from noon to 5. Admission is free.

Next, head east and north for Raynham Hall in Oyster Bay, which the British used as officers' quarters when they occupied the town. State Route 106 north from the Long Island Expressway becomes South Street and leads to West Main Street where a left turn takes one to the house. The original part, built in 1730, was bought and enlarged by a merchant, Samuel Townsend, in 1738. In 1776, Nathan Hale, trying to get back to his lines, stopped there for help and was given a horse. Lieut. Col. John Graves Simcoe, commander of the Queens Rangers, a crack Tory regiment, lived in the house during the winter of 1778-79 while his men engaged in operations in New York and New Jersey. Major John André, a staff officer with the British commander in chief, Sir Henry Clinton, and Benedict Arnold's co-conspirator, visited it occasionally. On display there are three panes of the original window glass onto which three young Englishmen, one of whom may have been André, etched their sentiments concerning the charms of Samuel Townsend's daughters.

Raynham Hall was also the home of Washington's most effective secret agent, Townsend's son, Robert. Under the code name "Culper Jr.," he worked in Manhattan, where his business served as a front for an espionage operation that collected information from the British who were headquartered in the city. Robert, a practicing Quaker, is believed to have had a child by "Agent 355," a woman known only as "Lady," who may have been close to high British staff officers. Supposedly, "Lady," who was Robert's fiancée, was exposed and captured and died in childbirth on one of the infamous English prison ships in New York Harbor.

There are no records of Robert Townsend ever marrying; he did acknowledge a son named Robert Townsend Jr., who became a distinguished member of the State Legislature and tried to have erected a monument to the prison ship martyrs. Robert and his spinster sister Sarah lived out their lives in Raynham Hall. He is buried beside his father in a family plot located behind 51 Simcoe Avenue, Oyster Bay. Raynham Hall is open all year Wednesday through Monday from 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. Admission is 50 cents, 25 cents for children. It contains antiques and relics and documents associated with its Colonial occupants.

Farther east, Huntington, a hotbed of rebel sentiment, felt the invader's heavy heel. The town was occupied by several British regiments and suffered under the authority of noted scientist Benjamin Thompson, a Loyalist administrator who later became Count Rumford of the Holy Roman Empire. The occupation forces punished the townsfolk by using their churches as stables and forcing the local militia to build forts on Lloyd Neck, north of the town, to protect Cold Spring and Oyster Bay Harbors.



Historical markers scattered through Huntington identify many sites connected with the occupation. A turn off Main Street (State Route 25A) onto New York Avenue (State Route 110) takes one to the David Conklin House which, with the Powell-Jarvis House, a mile farther east along Main Street, exhibits collections of antiques and relics associated with the Revolutionary War period. Both these Colonial frame buildings are open all year Tuesdays through Fridays from 1 to 4 P.M. and on Sundays from 2 to 5. Admission is 50 cents per house, or 75 cents for both, for adults; and 25 cents, or 35 cents for both, for children.

From Huntington, take a ride north toward Long Island Sound along West Neck Road off Main Street. The Sound, called the Devil's Belt during the Revolution, was a two-way street for raiding parties. The British raided American towns and bases in Connecticut, the Americans retaliated on their British counterparts on Long Island, and freebooters raided indiscriminately wherever the pickings were good. West Neck Road runs over a causeway to Lloyd Neck, where Thompson built Fort Franklin, named to honor William Franklin, Benjamin Franklin's illegitimate son and the last Royal Governor of New Jersey.

The remains of Fort Franklin are now incorporated into the landscaping of Fort Hill House, a private estate not open to the public. However, soon after West Neck Road becomes Lloyd Neck Road, it leads to Lloyd Neck Manor, which was used to quarter British officers. Its grounds supported a British Army encampment. The manor is open the year round on Wednesdays from 2 to 4 P.M. and on Sundays from 2 to 5. Admission is 50 cents for adults and 25 cents for children aged 7 to 14. The house, which was built in 1767, is still under restoration by the Society for the Preservation of Long Island Antiquities, and is being furnished with antiques.

About 24 miles east of Huntington, in Setauket, is a battle site, the scene of espionage operations by the Culper Ring and several 18th-century buildings. Old Field Road out of Setauket leads along the shore of Conscience Bay to a private beach at the foot of Crane Neck Road where Lieut. Caleb Brewster, an American militiaman who had left Setauket for Connecticut when the British moved in, landed with 500 men on Aug. 22, 1777. They had crossed the Sound in whaleboats, a reminder that the war had halted one of the island's major industries, whaling. Unable to go after whales, rebel Long Islanders utilized their whaleboats to go after the enemy as "whaleboat commandos." The Suffolk County Whaling Museum in Sag Harbor (about 50 miles to the east), once a major whaling port, has on display a collection of whaling relics including scale models of whaleboats.

The British had fortified the Setauket Presbyterian Church on the triangular village green, driving away the minister, the Rev. William Tallmadge. Brewster's men surrounded the church and a sharp battle ensued. The present Presbyterian Church was built in 1811 on the site of the earlier structure, but the Caroline Church on the opposite side of the green stood there when the fighting took place. It was built in 1729, is the second oldest Episcopal church in the country and has an unusual twisted steeple.

Its Tory minister, the Rev. James Lyon, proved to all the world one Sunday that the British pillaged all Long Islanders no matter what their politics. Pointing through the window of the church while delivering a sermon to his congregation, including a number of British officers, he bellowed, "Here I am preaching the blessed Gospel and there are your damned redcoats stealing my potatoes!"

Brewster, described as a lusty young giant, was part of the Culper Ring. To sample the ring's activities, take Dyke Road to the shores of Little Bay. When Dyke Road makes a sharp turn to the left, look for a historical marker on the left side of the road identifying the site of Abraham Woodhull's farm. Woodhull, whose code name was Samuel Culper Sr., did business with Samuel Townsend in Oyster Bay and frequently traveled to New York City, where he was in contact with Robert Townsend. Woodhull would bring back information of British movements to Austin Roe who ran a tavern in Setauket.

Look across the bay from the marker to a long strip of land on the other side called Strong Man's Neck. Anna Strong, the wife of Justice Selah Strong, who had been thrown by the British into a prison ship, would hang a black petticoat on her clothes line on this strip to let Roe know that Brewster was in the area. The number of handkerchiefs on the line told Roe where Brewster had hidden his whaleboat. Roe would get the information to Brewster who would carry it across the Sound to American headquarters in Fairfield, Conn.

About six miles east of Setauket is Mount Sinai Beach, known 200 years ago as Old Man Beach. In November 1780, Maj. Benjamin Tallmadge came ashore here with 100 Connecticut troops, marched across the island under cover of darkness and captured a British garrison. To follow the action, take Route 25A east to Route 45 (William Floyd Parkway) and go south. About three miles south of the Montauk Highway, in Mastic Beach, look for a sign for the Manor of St. George, which the British called Fort St. George, on the right at the intersection of Neighborhood Road. The Manor, consisting of a Colonial mansion on a 127-acre site, is open from May to October, Tuesdays through Sundays, from 10 A.M.-5 P.M. There is no charge for admission.

The British surrounded the site with a wooden stockade and built a four-sided redoubt. Tallmadge attacked from three directions and overpowered the garrison. A British ship loaded with supplies was burned and the fort's defenses were demolished. American losses were one wounded. Seven of the British were killed; the rest went to Connecticut as prisoners.

A severe drought during the summer of 1957 burned up the lawn, and an aerial photograph revealed the outlines of the four-sided redoubt. Archeologists have long been aware that for centuries grass will grow thin or discolored where topsoil has been disturbed. Today visitors to the Manor of St. George can trace out for themselves the perimeter of that wooden structure built almost 200 years ago.

The Chefs' d'Oeuvres Of Europe's Museums

By MARGARET MALKIND

"Will you share with five?"

"I will, I will," I answer, indiscreetly raising my voice on queue (on line) in the restaurant at London's Tate Gallery. After almost a week of eating in the "self-serves" of other London museums, breeding grounds of watercress and the sausage roll, I'm eager.

The tablecloths, shining wineglasses and waitresses evidence more refinement than I'm used to. True, I'm still in a museum basement with only a mole's-eye view of the Embankment, but yesterday I was in a snack bar with no windows at all.

What should I share with my five? I can't share conversation; they're locking themselves out pretending I'm not here. So I share their choice of the $3.50 roast chicken lunch ("Make it six, please") and eat it in quiet reflection.

I had just finished the first part of a trip that would take my husband and me, after London, to Paris, Basel, Rome, Florence, Munich and Amsterdam, in that order. I planned, among other things, to visit, or in some instances revisit, the famous museums in these cities and, because I'm in the habit of eating in museum restaurants, to satisfy my curiosity about their eating facilities. What follows are brief descriptions of the appearance, menu, service and prices of the museum restaurants where I had a meal, a snack or a drink. But first, a few general observations.

I already knew that eating in a museum is not the same as going to Maxim's. What I discovered was that the museum restaurants are worth a visit even if you think Tintoretto is a hair dye. And I learned that others eat strictly for hunger and convenience.

I also found that museum restaurants in Europe are not the native stalls they used to be. True, the Winged Victory could end up in the British Museum and the Rosetta Stone in the Louvre (which is where the French probably think it belongs, anyway) before you'd find a brioche in Bloomsbury or trifle in the Tuileries, but pizza, hot dogs and hamburgers are now as standard in museum snack bars as are ice cream, yogurt, Coca-Cola, fruit drinks, beer and wine.

The quick-snack incursion is so pronounced on the European museum scene that even the cafeteria in the Vatican Museums has gone American with milk shakes, doughnuts and three kinds of hamburgers. About the only truly native preserves left are the cafeterias in English museums, with their unending supply of sausage rolls, Cornish pasties and meat pies.

When I left the table at the Tate, avoiding a stare with the Unfriendly Five, I asked the hostess if the restaurant was always that crowded or if the Constable exhibition had brought everyone out. Her answer was that it would be wise to have a reservation at any time (telephone 828-1212).

Except for the Tate, museum restaurants in London are self-service operations. Both the National Gallery and the Royal Academy of Arts have buffet restaurant—plain, utilitarian places—in the basement, with the National Gallery's restaurant possibly a little cozier because the room is smaller and the walls are green instead of Bathroom White.

The menus are similar and consist largely of meat and fish salads and the ubiquitous veal and ham pies ($1 at the National Gallery; $1.60 at the Royal Academy), eggs (90 cents) and sandwiches, sausage rolls and hot soup (20 cents), as well as the usual cakes, scones, cheeses, drinks and wine by the glass.

But the Royal Academy's restaurant also offers a number of hot meals (shepherd's pie for about $1, roast chicken and a prawn curry for $1.60, and others) and has a small, rather dismal bar. During the Annual Summer Exhibition, this restaurant is bedlam at lunch time, with long lines and a frantic searching for tables.

Since the Victoria and Albert, another of London's great museums, closed its restaurant and snack bar last year, there's been no place to eat on South Kensington's museum row except at the Natural History Museum, whose dreary cafeteria is the same old steak and kidney pie, sausage, pizza, fried fish and chips-with-everything operation. But at least one is out of the basement for a change, with a view from the second floor of the display of elephants and rhinos in the museum's Victorian Gothic central hall.

The British Museum has moved its depressing little tearoom to bright, cheerful quarters in the annex (approached from the manuscript room and an outside iron staircase). The sausage rolls, Cornish pasties and meat pies are still there for the addicted, but there's also a salad of cheese, dates, raisins, walnuts and pineapple (no watercress) and a griddle combo you assemble yourself out of a whole mishmash of bacon, sausage, baked beans, peas, grilled tomatoes, chips and hamburger.

You'll run into some of the same revolutionary menu items plus an "Independence Burger" at the Dolphin Coffee Shop just outside the National Maritime Museum in Greenwich. The food is good here, beer and wine are available, and the restaurant is modern, light and airy, with the green grounds of Greenwich a few steps away.

Two museums in Paris have eating facilities—the Louvre and the Palais de Chaillot, which houses the National Maritime Museum and the Museum of Man.

The salad days of the Louvre cafeteria when one could get cold lobster and mayonnaise are over. Now it's "tuna mayonnaise" for $1.50. But the Louvre is still one of the best museums in which to eat. There's a cold roast beef plate for $2.50, a ham sandwich for 85 cents, an assortment of cheeses for 42 cents and patisserie for 85 cents, all attractively displayed in a glass case, and it all tastes good.

One hot plate a day is offered. When we were there, it was turkey for $3.25. Wine, mineral water and soft drinks are available at the counter, and coffee is served at the tables.

In warm weather one can sit on a terrace at the stone feet of France's great men and watch the street vendors below fold their ivory bracelets and African masks up in their blankets at the imperceptible signal of "Chickie the Flics."

There's also plenty of competition down below in the form of four or five privately owned cafes in the Tuileries gardens and two restaurants set up for the annual Festival of the Tuileries (April through August) on the terrace of the Jeu de Paume Museum facing the Place de la Concorde. A slow-moving line due to bottlenecks at the Louvre food counter (11:30 was better than 12) or a sunny day can make these other restaurants tempting alternatives.

In Switzerland, what began as a stroll to the Fine Arts Museum of Basel on a cloudy day turned out to be a pilgrimage in the pouring rain when my husband and I lost our way. When we finally arrived, we made right for the museum snack bar and a hot cup of tea that turned out to be, in Swiss style, a hot glass of tea.

This spotlessly clean, attractive little cafe has an assortment of cakes as well as various kinds of soft drinks, coffees, Ovaltines and even alcoholic beverages. The same daintiness characterizes the cozy little coffee bar in the Basel Museum of Folk Art where only drinks are served.

The Fine Arts Museum in Zurich really caters to the hungry art-lover, with both a self-service cafe and a complete restaurant. The former, which offers cakes and open-faced sandwiches, is on the main floor near the museum shop and looks out on a sculpture garden.

The restaurant is outside, next to the museum. To leave and return, you must have your admission ticket dated at the information desk in the museum. This is a large, comfortable public restaurant with both counter and table service — and waiters who speak English.

There were two specials on the rather extensive menu the day we were there: a liver dish for $2.60 and pork chops for $3.60. The food and service were good; the decor was pleasing; and we noticed as we left that there is table service outdoors in warm weather.

Except for the Vatican Museums' cafeteria, the only eating facilities in Italian museums I visited are snack bars, whose typical fare is cappucino, croissants, pizza, ham or cheese sandwiches on a hard roll, soft drinks, ice cream and alcoholic beverages. The surroundings are invariably classical: formal gardens, handsome buildings, headless torsos and stone-cold nymphs. Customers were few.

There's a snack bar in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence and, in Rome, at the Borghese Gallery and the National Museum in the Baths of Diocletian. And if you go to Hadrian's Villa, you'll find a snack bar-restaurant with tables outside under the trees, pottery for sale and a hamburger-pizza, ice cream and Coca-Cola kind of menu.

At the Vatican the cafeteria has obviously been designed to feed as many people as possible. Two lines can be served simultaneously at the brightly-lit counter where pictures of the dishes and their prices help one make those agonizing decisions; all the food, already on paper or aluminum plates, is easy to reach; and chilled red and white wine, mineral water and hard and soft drinks are on tap. What seems almost miraculous is that the hot food is very hot, and the cold very cold.

The restaurant can seat several hundred people at white formica tables for four, and a small army of bus boys keep the tables clean. Glass doors open out onto a terrace with a view of the Basilica of St. Peter.

Hamburgers range in price from 65 cents to $1.20; a hot dog cost 40 cents and fried chicken $1.

Vienna's Art History (Kunsthistorisches) Museum, which is really a museum of fine arts, has a comfortable little restaurant, with about 20 marble-topped tables and a small counter. The menu is simple; one hot dish and salad, one open-faced sandwich, a few Viennese cakes and strudel and the usual drinks, including beer and wine. Our lunch of two sandwiches, a hot dish and two teas came to $5.50.

Service was by an English-speaking elderly waiter in tails, and the pace was Viennese. Why hurry? The Titians and Holbeins aren't going to run away and the opera doesn't start till 7.

Things moved a little faster at the Teeraum in Munich's Alte Pinakothek (Old Art Gallery). Maybe it was the pink tablecloths topped by fresh wildflowers that inspired the waitresses.

There were two $3 specials, consisting of soup, a meat and vegetable entree (roast pork or a schnitzel) and a slice of canned pineapple, as well as a simple a la carte menu. Beer, including that contradiction in terms, a diet Pilsner, cost 88 cents; Coke was 72 cents, ginger ale $1.12 and an orange drink $1.20.

Although the museum was crowded the rainy Sunday we were there, the restaurant, which seats about 150, was only half full. This restaurant is more than a convenience. Its food is good and its decor refreshing. Even its bare white walls seemed restful after the richness of the Rubens and Rembrandts in the museum.

The self-service cafe of the new (1973) Van Gogh Museum in Amsterdam glows: bright salads, baskets of oranges, carafes of red wine, orange tablecloths and pots of yellow nasturtiums on each table—a visual pick-up in a museum whose design emphasizes form over color. The food tastes as fresh as it looks and can be taken out to a terrace where there is a humorous zinc sculpture of a fellow diner, Kurt Metzler's "Dandy."

I found approximately the same food and prices—$1 for a herring salad, $3 for the ubiquitous schnitzel, $2.50 for a double hamburger with French fries and 60 cents for a broodje (a Dutch sandwich on a roll about half the size of our hamburger buns) at the Stedelijk, the modern art museum a few steps away from the Van Gogh. This self-service restaurant is in an old room brightened by pictures and books, with a terrace overlooking a pool and sculpture garden where children come to play.

There is a large self-service restaurant—more utilitarian than attractive—at the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. The food runs the gamut from the usual rolmops and broodjes to, at about $3 a lunch, steak, goulash and chicken. A menu with an English translation is posted outside the restaurant door, and seating is at long counters or a few cloth-covered tables.

The Municipal Museum in The Hague has a tearoom and a very good public restaurant in a garden behind the museum open for lunch every day. The Netherlands Open Air Museum in Arnhem has a restaurant that resembles a New England inn, with a view of a windmill and a bright blue historic farmhouse. It offers a complete menu of good food (judging by our lunch) at reasonable prices. Moreover, the waiters speak English, as almost everyone in The Netherlands does. And there is an exquisite little coffee bar in the exquisite Frans Hals Museum in Haarlem.

Margaret Malkind is a free-lance writer who lives in San Diego, Calif.

What's Doing in MILWAUKEE

By BEVERLY SOLOCHEK and COLEMAN BARKIN

GEMUTLICHKEIT—Milwaukee is more than a beer town—no matter how frothy TV's Laverne, Shirley and even old Fonzie might make it seem. True, you can still hoist a few in your choice of 1,660 taverns that, along with a profusion of old churches, dot the city's multi-ethnic neighborhoods. But in fact, Milwaukee has in recent decades bloomed into a midwestern educational and cultural center where first-rate ballet coexists peacefully with championship bowling. Many of the city's approximately 700,000 residents joined local industrial barons in financing both an art and a performing arts center, perhaps in an attempt to cast off a sense of being Chicago's northern shadow. And while experiencing the social and financial strains of most old urban areas, Milwaukee is considered a clean, low-crime city, its recent court-ordered voluntary busing scheme a model of civic cooperation. Milwaukee remains basically conservative, especially in its lifestyle, and exudes a traditional feeling of friendliness and welcome—Gemütlichkeit.

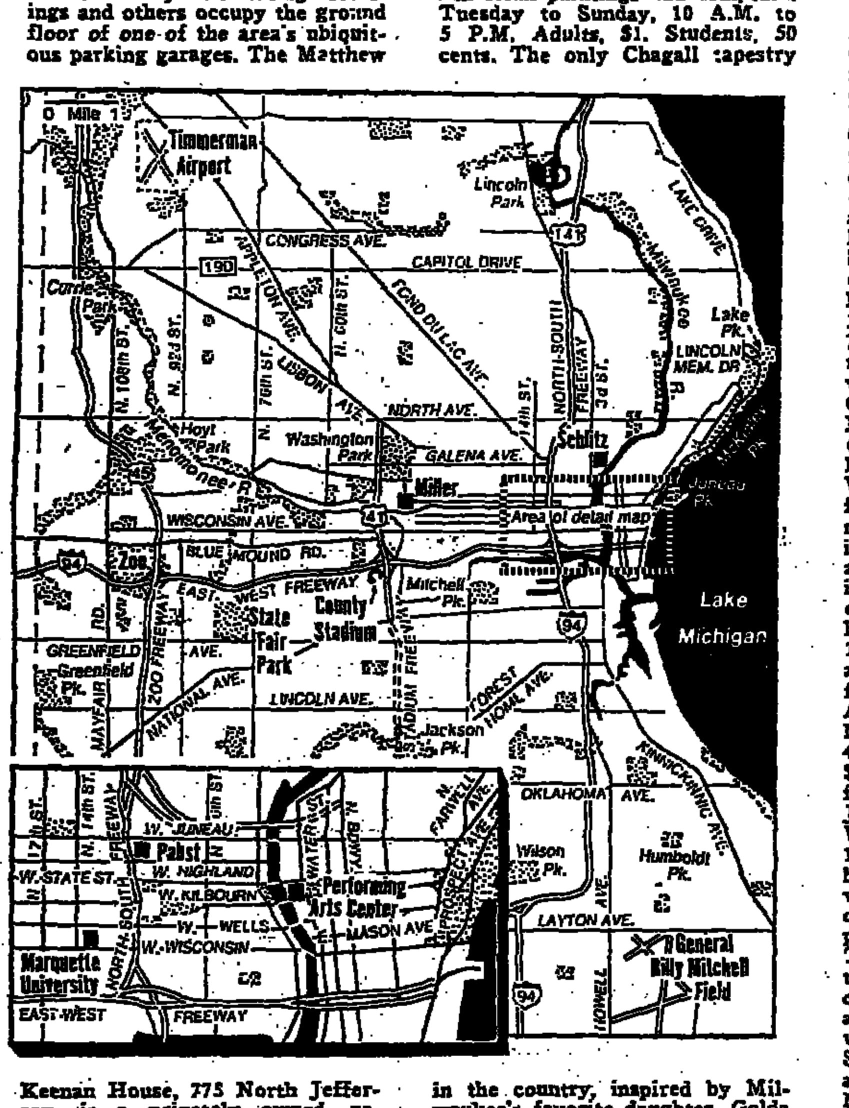
FESTIVITIES—Each autumn, in a burst of ethnic pride, thousands of Milwaukeeans eat and dance their way through a weekend of festivities, known as the Holiday Folk Fair, now in its 33d year. It's not only the area's dominant ethnic German and Poles who show up; 45 brightly costumed local ethnic groups sell handcrafts, produce exhibits and perform in the Folk Spectacle, a 90-minute extravaganza held five times over the weekend. The International Sidewalk Cafe, an ongoing groaning board stuffed with more than 200 varieties of homemade soups, pastries, sandwiches, meats and breads, is one of the fair's big draws, and it will be open next Friday from 5 to 11 P.M.; Saturday from 11 A.M. to 11 P.M.; Sunday from 11 A.M. to 10 P.M. It all happens at the three-building complex called the Milwaukee Exposition & Convention Center & Arena (MECCA), 500 West Kilbourn Avenue (tel.: 414-271-1750); adults, $2.50; children, $2.25. Reserved seats for the Folk Spectacle cost 50 cents.

GETTING AROUND—Milwaukee is an easy city to negotiate, whether by car or bus. Its natural boundary to the east is Lake Michigan. Wisconsin Avenue, which runs east-west, is the main drag downtown. Officially, the south side starts where the Menomonee River cuts through the city's large industrial valley, several blocks south of Wisconsin Avenue. The city is divided east and west by the Milwaukee River, which wanders down the northeast side of town to the downtown harbor where all the city's rivers, including the southerly Kinnickinnic, meet. The harbor is spanned by the surreal and locally notorious "bridge that goes nowhere" — a $104 million curiosity stopped in midair by a political fracas; it was meant to connect the downtown area directly to the southeast side. A network of freeways will get a driver anywhere in the city or sprawling suburbs, all within about 20 minutes of downtown. Milwaukee's bus system operates throughout the metropolitan area on a 24-hour basis. The fare is 50 cents, exact change required. There is a free one-hour transfer system. Mondays to Saturdays, from 9:30 A.M. to 4 P.M., there is a green and white downtown shuttle bus that travels along Wisconsin Avenue and costs 10 cents a ride (For transit information call 414-344-6711). Don't expect to hail a taxi here; either go to a taxi stand at one of the larger downtown hotels or call one of the numerous taxi companies one-half hour to an hour before you need transportation. Yellow Cab runs a limousine to and from Gen. Billy Mitchell Field, the city's major airport, every 20 minutes; stop-offs are at the main downtown hotels and the fare is $2.40 a person. And until 9:30 P.M. the bus system provides service between the airport and Wisconsin Avenue at Sixth Street (it's bus No. 80 and the fare is 55 cents.) Maps and other pertinent information are available at the Milwaukee Convention & Visitors Bureau, 828 North Broadway (414-273-3950), and in the lobbies of the City Hall, 200 East Wells Street, and The Milwaukee Journal, 333 West State Street.

BREWERY TOURS—Although Milwaukee has long since outgrown its beer-barrel image, it is beer, after all, that made the city famous. Its three breweries offer free tours that end up in hospitality rooms where adults can sample the products. The Joseph Schlitz Brewing Company, 234 West Galena Street (414-224-5252), holds hourly tours Monday through Friday, 9 to 11 A.M. and 12:30 to 3:30 P.M. The Pabst Brewing Company, 901 West Juneau Avenue (414-271-0230), conducts tours Monday through Friday, 10 A.M. to 4 P.M. The Miller Brewing Company, 400 West State Street (414-931-2153), keeps identical tour hours, and in addition conducts Saturday tours until Nov. 20 from 8 A.M. to 2 P.M.

ARCHITECTURAL LANDMARKS — Native Wisconsinite Frank Lloyd Wright endowed Milwaukee with two buildings. One of his last major works is the Annunciation Greek Orthodox Church, 9400 West Congress Street, a reinforced concrete sphere alight with blue and gold that he called "my little jewel." Open to visitors Monday through Saturday, 10 A.M. to 3 P.M., 50 cents admission. (Bus No. 57). The privately owned and occupied Bogk House, 2420 North Terrace Avenue, is representative of Wright's earlier Prairie School style. (Bus No. 30). This residence is in an affluent lakeside neighborhood filled with turn-of-the-century homes and institutions. A few steps south of Bogk House, where Terrace and North Avenue cross, is a 175-foot limestone Water Tower, built in 1873 as part of the first municipal water-pumping system. The nearby Villa Terrace Decorative Arts Museum, 2220 North Terrace Avenue (414-273-7290), is an Italian Revival villa that merits a look. Open Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday, 1 to 5 P.M. Free admission. The Pabst Theater, 144 East Wells Street, is a national historic landmark recently restored and renovated to its richly ornamented turn-of-the-century splendor. Across the street is the old Flemish Renaissance City Hall building, 200 East Wells Street. The tiny medieval St. Joan of Arc Chapel on the Marquette University campus, at Wisconsin Avenue and North 14th Street, was transplanted to this country stone by stone from its original site in a French village near Lyons. Open daily 10 A.M. to 4 P.M. On the city's south side is the country's only Polish basilica, St. Josaphat Basilica, 2336 South Sixth Street, which was built at the turn of the century by its thrifty congregation out of materials salvaged from a Chicago post office. (Bus No. 80).

BROWSING—Milwaukee has more than 100 antique shops, about 50 book stores (nine of which specialize in rare and out-of-print editions) and numerous galleries, and enough of these will be found in the downtown area to keep a visiting browser quite active. Milwaukee's oldest book store, Desforges, 427 East Wisconsin Avenue, is across the street from the Pfister Hotel, whose elegant lobby is a nice spot to stop for a drink. Running north from the Pfister on Jefferson Street is a flurry of little shops filled with antiques, contemporary crafts, fine china, linens and the like. Some are in architecturally interesting buildings and others occupy the ground floor of one of the area's ubiquitous parking garages. The Matthew Keenan House, 775 North Jefferson, is a privately owned, restored cream brick villa that dates to 1860. (Milwaukee was once known as "cream city" owing to the color of the bricks that were peculiar to the area; most of the old brick facades are now pollution gray.) Native Wisconsin products are sold in stores at the corner of Highland Avenue and North Third Street, a pleasant intersection of restored brick streets, gaslights and benches just a few minutes north of Wisconsin Avenue. The cheerful Wisconsin Cheese Mart, 215 West Highland Avenue, (414-272-3544) offers a wide variety of local cheeses and beer steins. Next door is Usinger's, 1030 North Third Street, (414-276-9100), an Old-World sausage maker. The old-fashioned retail shop is worthy of a detour if only for its piquant aromas, brass and marble décor and elfish murals that date to 1906. Near Marquette University is the David Barnett Gallery, 2101 West Wisconsin Avenue (414-344-6070), which features local and international artists. Currently, until Dec. 2, there is a retrospective of original art work from the Li'l Abner comic strip. Tuesday through Saturday, 10 A.M. to 5 P.M.



PARKS AND ZOO—Milwaukee has more than 100 parks sprawling over 13,000 acres. They include Whitnall Park with the Boerner Botanical Gardens, 5879 South 92d Street (best seen in warm weather); Frederick Law Olmsted's Lake Park, 3233 East Kenwood Boulevard, which sweeps along the Lake Michigan shoreline, and the Horticultural Conservatory in Mitchell Park, 524 South Layton Avenue, which features plants displayed in natural settings in three huge geodesic domes. The domes are open daily 9 A.M. to 9 P.M. (Monday to 5 P.M.). Admission 50 cents. A listing of parks with bus routes and amenities like archery ranges, nature trails, golf courses and pools can be obtained free. Write: Milwaukee County Park Commission, Education and Information Division, Room 301, Courthouse, Milwaukee, Wis. 53233. (414-278-4345). The Milwaukee Zoo, 10001 West Bluemound Road, (414-771-5500) features animals in fenceless lifelike physical surroundings native to their species. It has a fine aviary, too. Open daily 9:30 A.M. to sundown. Adults, 50 cents; children, 25 cents. (Bus route 10 Wells-Bluemound.)

SPORTS AND RECREATION—Milwaukee's baseball Brewers share the 50,000-seat Milwaukee County Stadium, 201 South 46th Street, with the Green Bay Packers, who play a number of home games there. Next Sunday they meet the National Football League-leading Minnesota Vikings. Tickets, $6 to $10. (414-342-2717). The professional basketball season is already under way and the Milwaukee Bucks can be seen at the 11,000-seat Milwaukee Arena, 500 West Kilbourn Avenue. Tickets $2 to $6 (414-272-6030). Also playing there are the nationally ranked Marquette University Warriors. $3.50 to $4.50 for regular season games; $9.50 for the four-game Milwaukee Classic Tournament, Dec. 27-28. (414-224-7127). Professional wrestling can be seen at MECCA. (414-271-2750). Milwaukee is also the site of the National Bowling Hall of Fame and Museum, 5301 South 76th Street (414-421-6400). Monday through Friday, 9 A.M. to 4 P.M. If it inspires you to take bowling ball in hand, Milwaukee has about 100 alleys. And its park system contains ice-skating rinks, skiing and toboggan slopes and cross-country skiing facilities. (414-278-4345.)

MUSEUMS — The Milwaukee Art Center, 750 North Lincoln Memorial Drive, designed by Eero Saarinen and sitting on a downtown bluff overlooking Lake Michigan, houses, among other things, one of this country's largest collections of Haitian art. The new Bradley Wing, with its helpful tele-guide system and serene lake vista, contains a fine collection of 20th-century German, French and American paintings and sculpture. Tuesday to Sunday, 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. Adults, $1. Students, 50 cents. The only Chagall tapestry in the country, inspired by Milwaukee's favorite daughter, Golda Meir, can be seen in the lobby of the nearby Helfaer Community Service Building, 1360 North Prospect Avenue. (8 A.M. to 10:30 P.M.) The Milwaukee Public Museum, 800 West Wells Street, America's fourth largest museum of natural history, is known for a fine collection of American Indian artifacts. Open daily 9 A.M. to 5 P.M.

CULTURE—The modern Performing Arts Center, 929 North Water Street, has three major halls in which the city's repertory theater, ballet company and symphony orchestra (led by Kenneth Schermerhorn) perform, as do other local groups and visiting artists. Coming events include Ella Fitzgerald, Nov. 24, 8 P.M.; the Nikolais Dance Company, Nov. 29, 8 P.M. and Nov. 30, 2 P.M and 8 P.M.; the Milwaukee Repertory Theater in Noel Coward's "Private Lives," Dec. 10 to Jan. 16; Andrés Segovia, Jan. 21; Jean-Pierre Rampal with the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, March 19, 8:30 P.M. and March 20, 7:30 P.M. Ticket prices vary with the event but are generally in the $3-to-$12 range. (All ticket information: 414-273-7121). The Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra sponsors open drop-in rehearsals prior to specific concerts for $1. Coming ones include violinist Eugene Fodor, Dec. 3, 2 P.M.; pianist Leonard Pennario, Jan. 7, 2 P.M., Margaret Hillis, guest conductor, Feb. 19, 10 A.M. Touring Broadway shows and local groups use the Pabst Theater. The Milwaukee Repertory Theater will perform Dickens's "Christmas Carol" Dec. 8 to Dec. 26. Adults, $3 to $7; children, $1.50. Performers in the Pabst Theater's Artists Series include pianist Ruth Laredo, Jan. 19, 8 P.M.; soprano Jessye Norman, Feb. 1, 8 P.M.; I Solisti di Zagreb, Feb. 26, 8 P.M., and the Julliard Quartet, March 10, 8 P.M. Tickets range from $3.50 to $6.50, and may be ordered by mail with checks payable to: Artist Series at the Pabst. Write: Pabst Theater, 144 East Wells Street, Milwaukee, Wis., 53202. (414-271-3773).

NIGHT LIFE—If you know where to go, you'll find a surprising diversity of nightlife in Milwaukee. Las Vegas-style entertainment shows up at the Crown Room of the Pfister Hotel, 424 East Wisconsin Avenue (414-276-1200), where Tommy Leonetti is booked Nov. 15 to 27. Coming up are Dick Shawn, Jan. 17 to 29, and Phyllis Diller, Feb. 7 to 19. At the Bombay Bicycle Room, in the Marc Plaza Hotel, 509 West Wisconsin Avenue, jazz pianist Buddy Montgomery plays nightly except Sundays. (tel.: 414-271-7250). Good local jazz can be heard at Sardino's, 1617 North Farwell Avenue (414-545-5040). The local politicos hang out at the Harp, 113 East Juneau Avenue, a tiny old riverside tavern that features hot soft pretzels with mustard and Mayor Henry Maier warbling a homemade polka from the jukebox. The music of Beethoven, Bach and Mozart is the core of a classical discotheque on Tuesday and Friday nights at La Boheme Cafe, 319 East Mason Street (414-224-0150). For live country-western music and lots of local color, try Nick's Nicabob, 2538 West State Street (414-342-9931), a raucous room with a dance floor. And for something a bit different, there is Century Hall, 2340 North Farwell Avenue (414-276-6030), a reconverted bowling alley with bar and dining room in an old Victorian house. It offers eclectic live entertainment plus dancing and table games. Open daily from 11 A.M. to 2 A.M. (3:30 A.M. on Saturday).

RESTAURANTS—Servings tend to be generous, the atmosphere casual and prices moderate since they are often for full dinners although menus do not always indicate that. Dinner reservations are usually advisable. It is the German establishments that enjoy a national reputation; perhaps the best of the lot is Karl Ratzsch's, 320 East Mason Street (414-276-2720). A filling sauerbraten-and-potato-dumpling dinner is $8.25. There's an excellent wine list and imported Hacker-Pschorr beer. The real ethnic finds in town are two south side Serbian spots run by members of the same family. Old Town, 522 West Lincoln Avenue (414-672-0206), is the larger, more traditional establishment. Three Brothers, 2414 South St. Clair Street (414-481-7530), occupies a small, ancient corner tavern. Burek, a huge meat, cheese or spinach pie big enough for two ($5), is a specialty, as is "Serbian tea," a hot liqueur not on the menu. Nicolo's, 1332 East Brady Street, (414-276-7477) is a popular Italian restaurant, where dinner, including wine, will run about $10 a person. For Greek food, Kosta's White Manor Inn, 1234 East Juneau Avenue (414-272-4029), offers a good but limited menu in a lakeside setting. When Milwaukeeans want fresh fish, they are apt to travel 25 miles north of downtown to Port Washington, Wis., (Route 141; turn east at Route 33), where a Lake Michigan landmark called Smith Brothers serves fresh-water favorites like walleyed pike ($6.65). Daily, 11:30 A.M. to 9 P.M. Reservations accepted until 8:30 P.M. In town for fresh fish try the handsome Anchorage in the Hilton Inn, 4700 North Port Washington Road (414-464-1790). Stuffed lemon sole, $7.50. There are three spots—open for lunch only—that merit visits. Jake Levine's Delicatessen, 1634 West North Avenue (414-562-1272), 10 minutes from downtown by cab, is an old-fashioned deli whose hand-sliced pastrami and corned beef are pickled on the premises. (Sandwiches under $2) Try Jake's special garlic sticks and the egg bagels (from the locally celebrated Miller's Bakery) that are the croissants of the bagel world. Open until 5:30 P.M. Closed Sundays. Everything is homemade at the genteel Watts Tea Shop, 761 North Jefferson Street, (414-276-6352), including its breads, muffins and desserts. Closed Sundays. In an altogether different mode is Turner's Bar and Restaurant, 1034 North Fourth Street, (414-273-5590), in a 19th-century building that houses an association of gymnasts. Its inexpensive, hearty German fare includes an excellent liver dumpling soup (large bowl, 65 cents) and a pork, cabbage and boiled potato plate ($2.35).

HOTELS—Milwaukee has two large well-known convention hotels, one on each side of the downtown area. At the Marc Plaza, known to old-timers as the Schroeder, 509 West Wisconsin Avenue (414-271-7250), a single is $27 and doubles range from $34 to $40. The Pfister Hotel and Tower, 424 East Wisconsin Avenue (414-273-8222), is generally considered Milwaukee's finest. The original eight-story structure, built in 1897, has retained its turn-of-the-century charm even with the round 23-story addition that has a pool and health club. Singles start at $29.50; doubles go from $37.50. Suites range from $76 to $250. The Milwaukee Inn, 916 East State Street (414-276-8800), is in the east downtown area and some rooms get a lake view. Singles are $19; doubles, $25. The Astor Hotel, a pleasant residential hotel at 924 East Juneau Avenue (414-271-4220) has 68 transient rooms. Singles are $14-$15; doubles are $17-$18. There is the usual complement of motels throughout the area; The Downtowner Motor Inn, 611 West Wisconsin Avenue (414-273-2950) is centrally located. Singles, $20; doubles, $25. The YMCA, just below the Marquette University campus and within walking distance of downtown at 915 West Wisconsin Avenue (414-276-5077), has some singles for transients, $9 to $12, and four doubles, $18 to $20. Women are welcome. The Hilton Inn, 4700 North Port Washington Road (414-962-6040), sits on the Milwaukee River about 15 minutes north of downtown by car. It has a warm, homey atmosphere not normally associated with chain motels, but it is difficult to reach by bus. Singles start at $23; doubles, $30.

NEW JERSEY NEW JERSEY NEW JERSEY

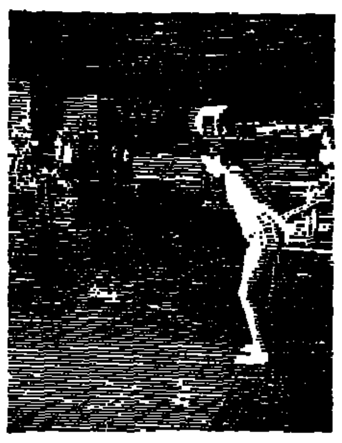
The Playboy Great Gorge Thanksgiving Day Menu:

Turkey, golf, tennis, swimming and The Hudson Brothers.

When you spend the Thanksgiving weekend at The Playboy Resort and Country Club, you don't just get turkey with all the fixings. You get golf, tennis, swimming, even the great entertainment of The Hudson Brothers. And you won't have too travel far. Because we're only about an hour's drive from New York City.

From the moment you arrive, you'll know this Thanksgiving weekend will be special. You'll never be stuck in the "old wing" because at Playboy Great Gorge, there are no old wings. Every one of our rooms is new and luxurious, most even have a balcony.

But you won't want to stay in your room for long. Not when you can play in 800 acres of pure country. You'll find our 27-hole championship golf course a new challenge every time out. There's indoor and outdoor tennis, horseback riding, Olympic size indoor pool, badminton, basketball, miniature golf, a health club, saunas, the world's largest whirlpool and a three-level game room with every electronic wonder you could want. There's even a shopping arcade.



When it comes to eating, Playboy believes "variety is the spice of life". We have six restaurants which cater to every appetite and mood. So whether it's boeuf bourgignon in the elegant VIP Room or a hamburger in our indoor Sidewalk Cafe, you'll eat when you want, not when you're told.

At night see top name entertainment in the Cabaret. Or go dancing in the Bunny Hutch Disco and have a nightcap in the Playmate Bar.

We also have a complete day camp program and baby-sitter service because we know sometimes you must want a vacation from the kids.

And by the way, when you do sit down for that traditional Thanksgiving Day feast, you'll get a Thanksgiving Day feast you'll never forget — turkey with all the fixings.

Cross-Country: A 6-Day Tour Through the Rocky Mountains

By NORMAN D. FORD

The early sun cast a pale glow across the vast white landscape of Rocky Mountain National Park in Colorado. After a breakfast of fresh fruit and oatmeal, the six of us had driven the few miles from the inn at Estes Park to Lawn Lake Trailhead inside the park. Now, as the sun lit the wild, steep peaks, we stood beside our parked cars slipping on rucksacks, gloves, touring skis and poles. It was 10 degrees above zero and eight inches of fresh powder snow lay underfoot.

Like a line of gray moles, we skied off up Fall River Road. Barely discernible under its mantle of snow, the one-lane road switchbacks for miles across the Continental Divide, serpentining through some of the most spectacular scenery in the Rockies.

Moving poles and skis in silent harmony, we developed a fluid, rhythmic glide that took us along at twice the speed of a hiker. We glided out into an immense world of aspens, evergreens and towering white peaks. Our long cross-country stride soon had us sweating, and we stopped to doff sweaters.

This was the beginning of the first day of a week-long itinerary of ski touring (with overnight stops at inns) worked out by the leader of our group, Franz Schroeder, a Swiss-born neighbor of mine in Colorado. The six one-day trips would take us over some of the most exciting ski trails in the state's Front Range (and to an unplanned look at an avalanche). We all wanted to enjoy the exercise, the solitude and the scenery without the need of ski lifts or resorts. All six of us, it turned out, also had in common a diet of unrefined carbohydrates—fruit, vegetables, whole-grain cereals, rather than conventional high-fat, high-protein foods.

Franz was the only expert skier in the group. The rest of us—Franz's wife, Betty, Ward and Jean Lyons of Boston, Larry Shelton of Denver and I—were capable intermediates. We were all over 40.

Fall River Road, originally the only vehicular road across the park, begins at 8,970 feet and climbs up to cross the top of the continent at 11,600 feet. After a mile and a half of fast, level skiing, the road slanted abruptly uphill for the next eight and a half miles. Of course, the uphill grade slowed our pace, but by taking shorter steps we still glided ahead. Below us, the valley floor looked like an incandescent meadow.

By 11, we'd climbed about 2,000 feet and stopped for lunch in the meadow at Willow Creek. Sitting on a sun-warmed log, we ate dark homemade bread with peanut butter, dates, roasted soybeans and dried fruit-bars.

As the sun gradually warmed the crackling cold, we skied on up the last three miles of road to finally emerge from the woods on the frigid arctic tundra of the Continental Divide. All around, a jumble of rugged rock spires and pinnacles poked above the mountaintops, some blown bare, the others draped in snow. Six hours after leaving the cars; we reached a lonely log cabin at 11,600 feet.

Now we had to turn around and ski back. The cars were 10 miles away, but there were eight and a half miles of unbroken downhill running below us. One by one, we shoved off and floated silently downhill. Giving only an occasional kick or a push with our poles, we glided effortlessly down the long, arcing turns. Rocketing down the steeper pitches, we experienced the ultimate joy of motion, grace and rhythm.

By the time we had driven back to the Fawn Valley Inn at Estes Park, the sun had disappeared behind the mountains and the thermometer was plummeting. Under the inn's blue Alpine balconies, yellow lights promised warmth, food and cheer. Each of us enjoyed a long, relaxed soak in a hot tub before meeting around the log fire for a glass of hot apple cider.

Dinner was mountain trout with rice and baked potato, tossed salad and homemade bread. While eating in restaurants we did our best to follow our diets and were quite successful in avoiding fats and reducing the amount of animal protein. But when preparing our own food we were completely vegetarian.

After dinner, no one thought about après-ski life. Long evenings of drinking and dancing are for skiers who've been hauled up mountains on mechanical lifts. On our first day, we had skied 20 miles. Tired we were, but thanks to our fitness training—jogging and biking—and to our prudent diets, none of us was greatly fatigued. Even so, by 9 P.M. we were all fast asleep.

For our second day, Franz had scheduled a 12-mile circuit through the heart of the park's glacial area. This time we dropped off one car at Moraine Park before the six of us crowded into the other for the 10-mile corkscrew climb up to Bear Lake at 9,475 feet. We skied around the lake, past icicled grottoes and frozen waterfalls, and sidestepped up the Bierstadt Moraine. The day was bright and sunny. Jagged peaks loomed all around and we stopped to view the stirring panorama of Glacier Basin spread below with the rugged east face of Longs Peak towering 14,256 feet at the far end. Soon we were skiing on open tundra across the shoulder of Flattop Mountain. By 10 A.M., we'd reached Lake Helene, at 10,600 feet the highest point on today's tour. Suddenly, we were confronted by a steep 250-foot drop-off.

"We'll traverse down it," Franz said.

"How about avalanche risk?" Ward asked.

"It looks O.K.," said Franz, "but let's go down one at a time."

I elected to descend first while the others remained on top. Should a skier be buried by an avalanche, his only hope of rescue lies in the surviving members of his party. I tied a red avalanche cord around my waist and let its 18-yard length trail out behind. In case I was buried, the cord would probably float on the surface so that the others could locate me.

To stay under control, I descended at a gentle angle and a slow speed. When I reached the other side I stopped, kick-turned an about face, then traversed across the slope in the opposite direction. It took a dozen of these traverses to switchback to the bottom. A few small slides occurred but there were no signs of avalanche.

The others followed one by one, Franz last. It took about 45 minutes for us all to descend.

The ability to spot potential avalanches rapidly becomes second nature among touring skiers in the Rockies. Skiing among deep woods is usually safe because the trees anchor the snow. But out in the open, it's best to give a wide berth to any slope with a grade of more than 25 degrees.

On the go again, we built up a warm glow almost immediately, dropping in a series of sweeping curves that led down through open meadows to Odessa Lake. A downhill run then took us flying through snow-laden trees to Fern Lake.

After lunch we had a fast downhill run through primeval forests to Fern Falls and the Big Thompson River. Snow blanketed the river ice and our long, gliding strides on it soon covered the remaining three miles back to Moraine Park—and the car. By sundown we were back at the inn after the most difficult ski tour that any of us but Franz had done. It is described in the Colorado Mountain Club guidebook as "Not for the faint-hearted."

Day number three was designed to give us a half day's rest while we drove from Estes Park across the Continental Divide to Dillon, our base for the rest of the week. We broke the drive at Bakerville where we were to ski for four hours on the Grizzly Gulch Trail. The trail began outside the door of a cafe. Almost immediately, we were skiing steeply up a wide, snow-covered road through the woods. We were all conscious of the profound stillness amd peace that only the touring skier knows. On past some tumbledown mine buildings, Grizzly Gulch Trail led us up to timberline where we finally emerged into an immense snow-filled amphitheater.

It was all downhill back to the cafe, a breathtaking 90-minute slide down the long, curving trail climaxed by a mile of snowplowing down the steep, wide road. Before dark, we reached the Ski Tip Ranch near Dillon which was to be our home for the next four nights. The ranch gave us access to the entire western slope of the Front Range, an area of tall peaks and huge bowls where we could ski for miles.

For our first venture, we parked a mile north of Berthoud Pass and skied up through the woods. Crossing an open meadow, we felt a sudden drumming. With an earthquake-like shock, the entire snowfield plunged six inches under our skis. Huge puffs of powder snow blew up around each tree. We stood petrified.

"There was air space under the snow," Franz said. "Our weight collapsed the snow and the air was blown out through holes around the trees. It's not dangerous here. But it does indicate an unstable condition. We'll have to avoid any steep slopes."

As we broke out of the trees at 11,600 feet, we saw a wide series of gentle slopes that led up to a high pass. As Franz had said, the slopes were too gradual to provoke an avalanche. But elsewhere it was different. Twice, off in the distance, we heard the long rumble as thousands of tons of snow thundered down an unseen mountain. Then from our left came the jetlike roar of another avalanche. We watched this one in all its fury. An entire mountainside broke away in one huge white slab and charged downhill less than a mile from us. Though the snow slid only 200 yards, it was a full minute before all movement ceased. A cloud of powder snow 200 feet high hung overhead.

On the summit we stood spellbound by the panorama of range after range of snowy peaks reaching away for 100 miles. Descending, we had to ski deep powder, keeping our ski tips floating above the snow like a surfer riding a speeding wave. On into the trees we went, plummetting downhill in the telemark position, knees bent, turning around a tree, then swiftly changing stance to turn in the opposite direction. We coasted downhill for almost two hours before arriving back at the cars.

For the fifth day Franz had scheduled a brief introduction to ski mountaineering. From the ghost town of Montezuma, a few miles from the ranch, we were to ski to the summit of Webster Pass (12,093 feet). It took two hours of steady uphill gliding to emerge from the forest at the foot of Webster Pass. A long white slope led to the top, some 600 feet above. The easy way to climb a mountain on skis is to traverse at a gentle angle, working gradually uphill. Using this method, we took an hour to reach the saddle.

Gliding back down, I felt the real freedom of the mountains. In this huge open bowl I could ski freely in almost any direction. Here above timberline in Colorado, the touring skier can duplicate many of the thrills of downhill skiing without the crowds, hoopla and expense.

"The Great Downhill Run" was how Franz announced the sixth day's tour. We were to ski from the top of Vail Pass up to Shrine Pass, three miles and 700 feet higher. Then we'd glide nine miles down Turkey Creek to the town of Redcliff, a descent of 2,700 feet. It was another of those frequent sunny winter days and despite the 11,000-foot altitude, the climb made us warm. By the time we stood on Shrine Pass, I'd stripped down to my undershirt.

Then it was the same wonderful descent we had experienced each afternoon, gliding down one gentle slope after another, past forests, meadows and frozen creeks. No sound broke the stillness. Four miles below Shrine Pass we stopped for lunch—and for sunbathing. It must have been 50 degrees. We continued on down until Redcliff appeared. The main street was still covered by snow. As residents gaped, we skied past the Victorian frame houses to the town pub. Inside, a row of Spanish-speaking miners lined a stand-up wooden bar straight out of Gold Rush days.

The six of us sat at a table and the waitress brought us plates of bean burritos and crisp tacos stuffed with lettuce and tomatoes. Hardly routine fare for skiers—but then, our six days of touring had been very far from routine.

If You Go . . .

. . . to Colorado to ski tour, remember that snow conditions are best from New Year's to mid-March. For safety, go in a party of at least three and try to spend a few relaxed days getting acclimatized to the altitude before tackling the more strenuous trails.

At Denver airport, both Avis (303-398-3725) and Hertz (398-3693) offer cars with studded tires and ski racks at a weekly no-mileage rate of approximately $130 for a compact and $150 for a six-passenger car. Check snow conditions by calling Rocky Mountain National Park (586-2371) and Copper Mountain Ski Area near Dillon (668-2882). Phone between 9 A.M. and 4 P.M. (Mountain Standard Time) and ask specifically for ski touring conditions.

For reservations, contact Fawn Valley Inn, Box 220, Estes Park, Colo. 80517 (586-2388), which has two-bedroom, two-bath suites at $56 a day. Dinner there costs an average of $6. Also in Estes Park are Anderson's Wonder View Cottages, Box 427 (586-4158) and Valhalla Cottages, Box 1489 (586-3284), charging $30-$40 for six. Their units each have two bedrooms and a kitchen. At Ski Tip Ranch, Box 1438, Dillon, Colo. 80435 (468-9928), rates are $50 per couple, including full breakfast and dinner. For housekeeping accommodations in Dillon, contact Dillon Chamber of Commerce, Box 446, Dillon, Colo. 80435 (468-6222). Quadrangle survey maps, available at 75 cents each from Distribution Section, United States Geological Survey, Box 25286, Federal Center, Denver, Colo. 80225, and sold locally, are essential. Guides are available through Rocky Mountain Ski Tours, Box 413, Estes Park, Colo. 80517 (586-2114), and also through Ski Tip Ranch.—N.D.F.

Come to the Miami Airport Inn ...We've got a lot of surprises!

It's about time someone answered the "NO SURPRISE" motel chain.

It is unfortunate that a large hotel/motel chain finds it necessary to sell their accommodations and service with a negative comparison of lower standard properties.
A College Edition dictionary will confirm that the most common usage and meaning of "SURPRISE" is...WITH A SUDDEN FEELING OF UNEXPECTED WONDER"...and when checking further..."WONDER" in it's most common usage and meaning is "TO BE FILLED WITH ADMIRATION, AMAZEMENT OR AWE". Yes, we agree "THERE ARE NO SURPRISES" in that chain of hotels/motels. When you come to the BEST WESTERN MIAMI AIRPORT INN...we're proud of our SURPRISES...ALL GOOD ONES!

Ancient Peru: The Mysterious Images of the Nazca Plains

Marilyn Bridges

Aerial view of a killer whale, symbol of a headhunting cult, carved by the Nazca centuries ago. A human head hangs from the body.

sion. If I didn't know better, I would have thought it a road.

"The markings are not carved or dug out of the earth," Rolando says. He demonstrates. "They just pushed away the surface rock and exposed the white below. Just push away, push away, push away, and you have a line or a figure, you see?"

The orange rim of a primitive sunset stretched across the mountain tops in the west. The plains extending for almost 30 miles are absolutely silent. The sun is almost gone. The air chills. A sensation of ancient activity on the plains begins—absent from the senses—there, nevertheless. Almost reluctantly we leave and head for Nazca (270 miles) and our hotel.

Rolando tells us that the Hotel Montecarlo is by far the best in the area. Through the front archway, we reach a string of small cottages forming a semi-circle around a murky pool—too many insects dance along its surface. Other rooms are above the enclosed dining area and toward the front of the hotel. The layout and décor are Holiday Inn-ish, the grounds swept and trimmed.

The night is cool and dry. (Always, we are told. Seasons seldom change in this part of the country.) At dinner we talk about the recent balloon experiment on the Nazca Plains by members of the Florida-based International Explorers Society—they tried to prove that ancient balloonists directed the construction of the markings. Their Condor 1 aircraft had been aloft for only a few minutes when it crashed, dumping its crew of two and then soaring off by itself for an extended flight. The group claimed success—just technical problems had to be worked out. What did Peruvians think about it? I ask Rolando. He laughs.

"Inca legends talk about soaring warriors and flying gods," he said. "And in the mountains that surround the plains, Indian children still play with little hot air balloons. They must have learned the trick from somewhere?"

Rolando has his own theory: gliders. "Couldn't the Indians have glided over the plains like the giant condors?" he asks.

I ask the pilot, Alonso, what we will see tomorrow. He says that there are over 13,000 lines, some 100 spirals and about 788 figures. But in a 45-minute flight not all can be seen, so he will concentrate on the figures because they are the most spectacular. He cautions us not to eat breakfast before going up.

"The air currents often make the ride choppy, and you might get airsick."

At 8 o'clock the next morning we watch Alonso consume an enormous breakfast while we sip coffee. At the airport there is a shed for equipment, a small farm nearby. The four passenger Cessna stands lonely on the gravel runway. Soon we are bumping down the runway and aloft. The windows are left open for taking photographs. The engine is too loud for conversation—so we make signs.

We wait for the first markings. Tense. In the distance the surface is marked, but not clearly. Then almost at once the lines are under us. So clear that they might have been scratched on an etching plate. Some are parallel. Others crisscross each other. Long straight lines generate from flattened hills. Some of the lines converge at central points—others do not. Spirals spin on their own way.

Then a "landing strip"—an endless, eerie elongated trapezoid extending itself across the plains. It is ruler-sharp. There are more geometric figures: a triangle, quadrangle. A giant child with ruler and dividers in hand?

Suddenly, the first figures. We all shout! Camera clicks! A flower. A desert of zoo creatures: A monkey leans forward, his hands ready to grasp something; a comical anteater looks for food. A hummingbird.

"How big?" I shout in Alonso's ear.

"Maybe 300 meters across the wings."

900 feet! My God, I've forgotten about size! Now I see them as giants: a duckling is squat on the surface; a guano bird stretches its enormous body below. A condor, a pelican, a peacock.

The killer whale—And, yes . . . There! The head hanging from it. A beast: half bird, half reptile. Nameless, fantastic creatures.

On the side of a hill there is a figure of a man. A face leers out at me from the back of a bird.

The pilot is turning back. It is all over too soon. "Why's" still attack me. I look for a purpose—a grand design. My stomach is twisted; it's well we didn't eat. The landing is softer than the flight.

Later over breakfast, Alonso says: "I go up over 440 times a week, and each time I see more. Something beyond our reason is involved in it. At sunset, I feel the ancients."

After goodbyes, we take a brief run through the two-story city of Nazca. The collected population holds its own by agriculture and mining somewhere in the hills. It sleeps in the heat. Unpretentious and unexciting.

Starting back, Rolando says: "Maybe we will meet Maria Reiche." I know the name. The woman of the lines, 73, a German-born mathematician who for the past 30 years has lived on the plains, studying and charting the lines.

We stop at the new 60-foot viewing tower that stands next to the Pan American Highway in the middle of the plains. From the top three markings are visible; a guano bird, seaweed and part of a lizard that is cut in two by the highway. The same markings are not visible on the ground.

We find Maria Reiche on the plains. A dirt road, off the highway, leads toward the center of the plains. A guard stops us. Why are we trespassing? This is an archeological zone.

We say firmly that we want to see Maria Reiche. He argues, but finally, reluctantly, he gets in our car and takes us to her.

She is tall, almost skeletal. The sun has browned her like a native, lined her face, yet her movements are young, strong, confident.

My questions are basic: How were the markings made? Why were they made?

She has no patience with talk of ancient astronauts. Paul Kosok (the first scientist to study the markings) was essentially right in stating that the lines were for astronomical purposes, but there is some confusion. Not all the lines do what they are supposed to. There is a mathematical base for it all, however. Simple mathematics. . . .

She runs back to her tent to find figures—charts. The heat causes a mirage of her figure. She see[illegible] dance in the sand.

She returns with the chart. [illegible] matical wizardry to me, but I [illegible] stand that a series of arcs wer[illegible] to create the figures—she is s[illegible] least, of the spider drawing. But [illegible] a simple process. A string attac[illegible] both ends to poles. One was st[illegible] the ground, the other used to s[illegible] out an arc. A sort of compass.

She is sure that we will fi[illegible] exactly how they did all th[illegible] says, but she's not sure that [illegible] ever find out why.

But I wonder if the answer [illegible] lie in the simplest of facts. Tha[illegible] people saw in the skies wha[illegible] familiar to them: the creature[illegible] admired, hunted, feared and d[illegible] cated. We see in the constellatio[illegible] remains of mythology. The An[illegible] Indians saw great bears, de[illegible] spiritual warriors. Perhaps, the[illegible] people represented on the plain[illegible] they saw in the skies. But the[illegible] scratch them so large on the g[illegible] Who would see them—the god[illegible]

If You Go . . .

. . . to Nazca, you will first fly to Lima, Peru. Aero Peru, the airline with which you will likely do most of your flying, has daily flights to Lima from Miami (New York-Lima service is tentatively scheduled for early next year). Braniff International flies New York-Miami-Lima six times weekly with a minimum of two stops between Miami and Lima.

Since the climate of southern Peru, especially around Nazca, remains constant the year around (70's-plus temperature and dry), anytime is good for the drive from Lima to Nazca. (There is no scheduled air service between the two points.) Lima, the capital and departure point for Nazca trips, is humid most of the year, and summers (the reverse of ours) are hot.

Several operators in Lima have tours to Nazca. Lima Tours SA (P.O. Box 4340, Ocoña 160 Lima, Peru) is the biggest; it has tour conductors fluent in English, Spanish, Italian, French and German. Lima Tours SA offers an all-inclusive three-day package to Nazca and Paracus, an archeological site south of Lima that predates the Nazca culture that includes a night in Paracas and a night in Nazca. T[illegible] cost is $527, single; $300 a pers[illegible] double; $223 a person, triple. [illegible] optional flight over the Na[illegible] markings costs $85, single; $4[illegible] person, double; $34 a person, tri[illegible]

The price also includes a priv[illegible] car and tour conductor. Group ra[illegible] are available.

If you want to drive yourself, [illegible] and Hertz have representatives [illegible] Lima, and there are a number [illegible] local car rental dealers. The [illegible] mile drive along the Pan Ameri[illegible] Highway takes from six to ei[illegible] hours.

The best hotel in the Nazca a[illegible] is the Hotel Montecarlo (Callao [illegible] Nazca). Rates for room with priv[illegible] bath are around $5.40, single, [illegible] $9 for two. Next best is the G[illegible] ernment-owned Hotel Turis[illegible] Nazca (Bolognesi s/n, Nazca) w[illegible] rates of $7.50, single, and $1[illegible] for two.

If you want to fly over the li[illegible] Aero Condor can be contacted, [illegible] Las Camelias 780, of. 401, San [illegible] dro, Lima, Peru, or at the H[illegible] Montecarlo, Nazca. Cost for the [illegible] minute flight for three is about [illegible] a person. A 30-minute flight for [illegible] persons ($23 per person) is [illegible] available. Arrangements through [illegible] Peru should be made in adva[illegible] of arrival.—T.B.

The No.1 way to Barbados.

Ask your Travel Agent about American's special Rest & Relaxation vacation in Barbados —one of our nine Pleasure Islands.

Before you spend a week in Barbados this winter, spend a while with your Travel Agent this week:

Pick the right package. Pick the right price. And pick the right airline.

1) Barbados offers almost anything you could want. So American offers dozens of vacations there. All backed by the American Airlines Tour Warranty.

2) We've spent years planning the best 8 days and 7 nights of your life. And we'll help you spend them at a price you can afford: from Dec. 15 to Apr. 15, only $140 to $622 per person, double occupancy, plus air fare, meals, taxes, and hotel service charge.

We're American Airlines. Doing what we do best.

3) No one offers lower fares than we do either. So now that you can almost picture yourself relaxing on those sunny beaches, make sure you don't weaken. Pick the right airline!

In a recent independent survey of its members, the Airline Passengers Association named American "the number one choice for domestic travel." And the number one reason? "Service." So why settle for less to Barbados?

Fly American. And let us show you what we do best.

The Airline Passengers Association is an independent membership organization. For a copy of the survey, write APA, Box 2758, Dallas, Texas 75221.

DORADO BEACH HOTEL
Dorado Beach, Puerto Rico
Operated by Rockresorts, Inc.

People return to Paradise Beach Resort for the smiles, food, and Barbados beach. But mostly for the smiles.

They say Barbados is 21 miles long and a smile wide. But Paradise Beach is easily the widest smile of all.

Sure, people come back for the 4 Har-Tru® tennis courts, the 2-level pool, the nightly entertainment and the informal atmosphere (which is everywhere, from dance floor to deluxe oceanfront rooms). But we did a little survey. And guess what? Mostly people come back for the smiles.

We can't do enough for you

Willie, our water-sports specialist, will treat you to a cocktail cruise on his 41′ sloop. Our maître d' has a table for you facing the sea. And so it goes. Everyone going out of their way to make your stay delightful.

Spend a week for as little as $650-$680 per person, double occupancy. Get round-trip air fare from N.Y. on BWIA, transfers in Barbados, garden-view balconied room, breakfast and dinner daily, plus Manager's cocktail party. Gratuities and taxes not included. Deluxe oceanfront rooms are available at extra cost.

For full details and conditions see your travel agent, or call Cunard at (212) 983-2850, or mail coupon.

CARIBBEAN CARIBBEAN CARIBBEAN

Marriott introduces Barbados' newest resort. It started back in 182

That was the year the infamous pirate, Sam Lord, built his castle on Barbados, perhaps the loveliest island in the Caribbean. Certainly the one with the friendliest people. Here his Georgian castle still stands, overlooki magnificent beach. Surrour by a manicured English garden, seventy acres of private grounds.

All in all, a sumptuous estate that the Bajans wanted to share with other people. Along with their lovely island and warm friendly ways. So they invited Marriott h come and turn Sam Lord's into a new resort; one of the most beautiful on Barbados.

Marriott left the castle the way it was, and added a village of 200 deluxe guest rooms. And that's not all. Now there're 7 lighted tennis courts (all free), 3 pools (one especially for children) and, of course, the beautiful mile long beach. Nearby golf facilities can be arranged. As well as horseback riding, sailing, scuba and snorkeling. At Marriott's Barbados Resort, you can enjoy 4 restaurants and lounges. Dancing and music every night. Along with a handicraft center and duty-free shops. So you see, when it comes to making you happy, our new resort and the Bajans make a marvelous combination. Because Marriott makes it their business to make people happy. And the Bajans make it a way of life.

article by Christopher Wren, ling Through Scandinavia the he Scandinavians Do" (Travel , Oct. 24), was quite in tune ny experiences aboard these ships. Last summer I traveled y class to Helsinki from Copenhagen, and the accommodations were very pleasant.

In fact, because the ship never did "fill up," I had, by default, a cabin to myself, but going from Helsinki to Stockholm was a different experience entirely. Needing to save a bit, I, too, *had seen the accommodations in steer*age and decided that one night curled up in a "first-class airplane seat" would not be bad at all. Unfortunately, the weather was rough that evening. I could not afford the $5 dinner and had the cafeteria version of Swiss steak and potatoes instead, a meal which I soon relinquished.

The besotted young men on holiday in steerage were annoying everyone with their carousing (at 4 in the morning) as well as with their seasickness. I spent most of the night seeking the fulcrum of the ship and a chair in which to sit undisturbed.

The point is, steerage is steerage, no matter what the accommodations seem to be. Perched on top of the ship, deck passengers get the brunt of any tossing the ship might do. We found some comfort in quiet conversation in a lounge far beneath the water level, but we refugees agreed that the cheap liquor and cigarettes were bad company during a stormy crossing. The fault was not in the ship itself, or its personnel. It was in poverty and the discomfort inevitable in the arrangements of wealth on a luxury cruiser.

WOMEN ALONE

To the Editor:

Having just read Virginia Miles's article, "For the Woman on Her Own: Trust Pople—Within Limits" (Travel Section, Oct. 31), I say, "right on."

I have just returned from a three-week tour of France, driving a car by myself with a knowledge of some German and a very few words of French. My friends at home asked, "Aren't you afraid to be driving by yourself with no knowledge of the language?" They almost made me think twice about going.

The roads were great, even the small ones, the signs placed in strategic places which did not let one get lost, and even though I had to ask directions and couldn't make out what was told me in torrents of French, I made it.

No autoroutes for me. One does not get the flavor of the country driving on them.

I drove from Luxembourg, having taken Iclandic Airlines and stopping off a day in Iceland, then on to Paris where I stayed five days with a relative.

I then drove to Vezalay for a night, on to Perouges for another night, and then up and around mountains to Val D'Isere. Magnificent scenery. From Val-D'Isere, I drove to Tailoirs on Lake Annecy for an overnight stay and then on to a four-day stay with another relative in a tiny village outside of Strasbourg, and then on to Luxembourg and a plane back to New York.

A woman alone can do it alone. I met people along the way whom I talked to in English, naturally, and enjoyed myself. The last time I drove around Europe by myself was in 1956. I still can do it at the age of 57. So, ladies, take that trip alone. Stop being afraid.

ELIZABETH MEYER

North Olmsted, Ohio

To the Editor:

Cheers to Virginia Miles for trusting people in her travels. I agree with her thesis completely. As a business woman who frequently travels alone for work and for pleasure, I can testify firsthand to similar experiences.

My introduction to West Berlin was a grand tour of the city by night. An Italian business executive from Milan, who knew the city well, appointed himself my tour guide. We met in a crowded cafe that I had stumbled upon on my first eve in the city. The waiter had seated me at his table since we were both dining alone.

On a business flight to the West Coast I was assigned a seat next to a young woman from Bologna, Italy, who spoke very little English. My Italian is sketchy at best, but in five airborne hours we shared our family heritages, through a little Italian, a little English and a lot of gesturing.

On my first stay in England I discovered the underworld of London discos with a newfound Israeli friend who introduced himself while I was lunching at a Chelsea restaurant.

There are dozens of other "people adventures" I've experienced through traveling—all of them made possible, as Mrs. Miles says, by exercising courage.

JEAN L. FARINELLI

New York

To the Editor:

On a trip to Hakate, Japan, money was short and I decided to get to the airport via local bus. Saying only the airport name and hearing "hi" from the bus driver, I boarded the bus. After 15 minutes the ticket collector showed me the center door and not seeing any signs of an airport, I resumed my seat, trying to look inconspicuous. Soon we arrived at what was obviously the end of the route.

The driver and conductor had a conference. We started back to the city and when we arrived at a busy cross *street, the conductor removed my suit*case from the bus. I followed and he flagged down a car containing four Japanese men. Another conference, and he bowed me into the car. I got in and soon found myself at the airport, several blocks from the bus stop.

From this, I found a little giving on both sides really helps, and back home I always try, and help our visitors who are struggling with subway or bus maps. Why not? They appreciate it, and I know I do when I am traveling alone.

"NUISANCE CLAIMS"

To the Editor:

An article in the Notes Column discussed the Supreme Court ruling that allowed a class action in a case involving alleged losses suffered by travelers on tours (Travel Section, Oct. 24).

I do not minimize the importance to the traveler who has a legitimate *claim to have recourse for reimburse*ment for lost time and money due to real negligence. However, there are few travel agents or tour operators who have not been intimidated into settlements for strictly "nuisance claims" of clients who threaten to go to local consumer bureaus. It is cheaper to give them $25 or $50, even if unjustified, than to spend days explaining to consumer-oriented bureaucratic offices that it was not due to the agent's negligence that his ad read "Sunny Arizona," and it rained two days.

This may be a tongue-in-cheek example, but many claims are equally ludicrous.

A malfunctioning air-conditioned bus, a room not ready for early arrival, an inferior meal, a toilet that didn't flush, an overbooked flight, an ill-tempered guide, late flights, etc. have all been causes for "I'll Sue I'll Sue I'll Sue."

A strong comparison can be made with the financial disaster facing the

The new Cunard Countess. Can any other ship offer as much?

Newest ship for your 7-day Caribbean cruise

Because the Cunard Countess is brand-new, she offers exclusive features no other popularly priced cruise ship can match.

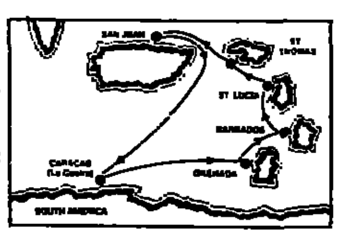
Like her "suspended" decks which absorb noise and vibration. More and bigger public rooms. More open deck space with a glamorous Lido/Pool area. Plus 4 bars, 3 nightclubs, casino, shopping arcade, sauna, cinema and a restaurant in the sky. All this, plus service in the 136-year Cunard tradition.

Staterooms designed for entertaining

These are no ordinary staterooms. In seconds, each bed slips out of sight. In its place is an upholstered couch. Suddenly your bedroom is a living room and you're ready for entertaining guests. It's just like getting two rooms for the price of one.

Cunard Countess has more outside cabins. And they are better priced than comparable rooms on competitive ships. Even her minimum-priced rooms are a special value.

5 ports plus South America



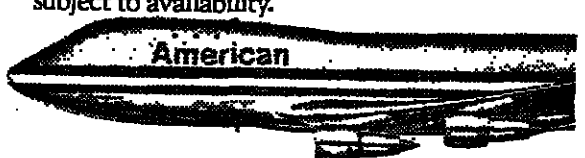
The new Cunard Countess has the best itinerary in the Caribbean.

You'll go all the way to South America with stops at Caracas (La Guaira), Venezuela, Grenada, Barbados, St. Lucia, St. Thomas, San Juan. No Miami-based one-week cruise can offer as much.

Fly American Airlines every Saturday from New York

This great value sails every Saturday right from San Juan. You can fly to meet the Cunard Countess with American Airlines.

Rates include accommodations on board, round-trip charter air fare, four superb meals daily and all entertainment aboard, port taxes and transfer between San Juan airport and the ship. Fly/cruise rates from New York: $555-$920.* Per person, double occupancy. Accommodations subject to availability.



Starting January 15, fly American Airlines 747. Now to Dec. 18 American Airlines 707.

Fourteen-day Fly/Cruise/Resort option

Combine your fly/cruise with one week at a Cunard resort: Hotel La Toc on St. Lucia or Paradise Beach Hotel, Barbados. Complete 2-week price: $770-$1010.* Per person, double occupancy. Meals extra at resort. (Eff. Jan. 8, price: $1195-$1530* including breakfasts and dinners at resort.)

See your travel agent, call Cunard/GWV Travel, Inc. at (212) 983-2510 or mail the coupon below.

*Effective Dec. 26, 1976: $675-$1040. Transportation via American Airlines through March 26, 1977. Flights on Dec. 26, Jan. 2 and Jan. 8 via Overseas National Airways, a U.S.-certificated supplemental air carrier; travel arranged by GWV Travel, Inc.

We had found the palace so enchanting on our afternoon visit that we wanted to see it once more and to feel its mystery in the dim light of evening.

To our surprise, the palace was open until midnight. The dozing guards did not want to let us in at this late hour, but we persuaded them and rushed to the Arrayanes Courtyard to see our favorite spot before the nighttime illuminations were put out. Our voices dropped, our steps slowed; we were awestruck by the sight before us. Four people were sitting on the stone floor in utter silence, gazing upon the green waters of the courtyard's pond which was reflecting the delicately carved columns of the palace in its still waters. Everyone was lost in his own reveries, and we immediately succumbed to the mood. It was a religious—almost mystical—experience.

So lost were we in our thoughts, that we failed to notice that the other visitors had disappeared. At precisely 12 midnight, all the lights went out and the Alhambra was enveloped in total darkness. We clutched each other and took tentative steps in the direction of the exit. Now I could vividly imagine Washington Irving's terror when he awoke during his first night alone in the palace. After what seemed an eternity, a guard approached with a flashlight and led us out.

Toledo and Granada are two of the most important stops for any visitor to Spain, and it is foolish to avoid them simply because of the crowds. The point is to individualize your travel experiences by taking the added time to plan your trip and read up on the places you are to visit. I keep thinking of those groups making their way through the tourist-lined rooms of the Alhambra, missing the very essence of the Alhambra, which I believe we experienced.

BOSTON

To the Editor:

The article by Jay Walz, "What's Doing in Boston" (Travel Section, Oct. 17), was most useful, but it just isn't true that "there is usually not too long a wait" at Anthony's Pier 4. The wait can be as much as three hours. By the time you're served, you don't care much about the quality of the food.

VILLAGE FOR SALE

To the Editor:

The article about the medieval French village of Cauvel (Travel Notes, Oct. 31), which my father is offering for sale contained a typographical error. The price is $115,000, not $15,000.

If you can steal the time, head for Greece and the Greek Isles this autumn.

The weather is nothing short of magnificent.

You can still sail the blue Aegean to the bewitching isles of Hydra, Aegina and Spetsai.

Echoes of a Golden Age still reverberate in Athens, Delphi, Olympia and Knossos.

The exotic shops and vibrant tavernas of Mykonos, Rhodes and Crete are now mostly free of other tourists.

And, on a more practical note, the price of airfare and hotels is getting lower and lower.

Steal the time.

There's no place on earth like Greece.

Olympic's Greek Autumn Sale.

Save17% on airfare.
Between the summer peak and now, Olympic's roundtrip group fare from New York has dropped $106* per person. Almost enough to pay for a week in Greece.

More than 200 tours.
We give you more tours to pick from than anybody. In all price ranges. Including tours that combine Greece with sunny Egypt and Africa.

Non-stop 747s.
Olympic has non-stop 747s year-round from New York. And 707 service direct to Greece from Chicago.

Call your travel agent or Olympic Airways now.

Just one thing. When that bouncy bouzouki music starts to play on one of our jets, we must insist you adhere to our long-standing rule...

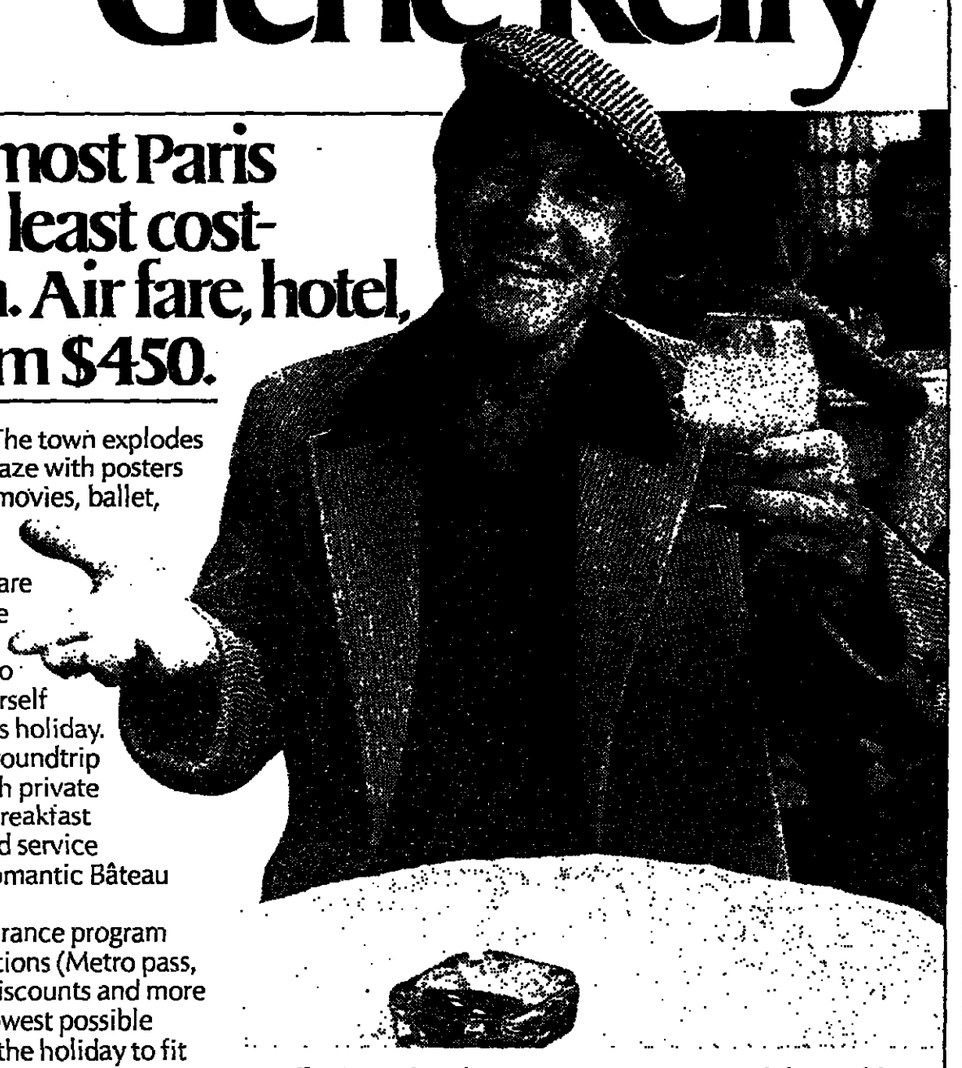
KLM Royal Dutch Airlines

"To the seasoned Francophile, Paris in the winter is the season."

Gene Kelly



A week of the most Paris options for the least cost-with Flexi-Plan. Air fare, hotel, and extras, from $450.

"Ah, I love Paris in the winter. The town explodes with excitement. The kiosks are ablaze with posters announcing openings of galleries, movies, ballet, L'Opéra, and the newest museum shows. The cafés teem with people from all over the world. Boutiques are briskly busy with the latest. And the discos are up all night."

Gene Kelly is the American who knows his Paris. Get to know it yourself with this great 8-day Flexi-Plan Paris holiday. The low $450* price includes your roundtrip New York/Paris air fare, a room with private bath at a good hotel (continental breakfast served every morning), all taxes and service charges, and special extras like a romantic Bâteau Mouche cruise on the Seine.

Flexi-Plan is the exclusive Air France program that offers the largest choice of options (Metro pass, excursions, car rentals, shopping discounts and more plus all available air fares) at the lowest possible prices. With Flexi-Plan, you create the holiday to fit your mood and budget.

For information on how Flexi-Plan can make the winter your season, speak to your travel agent. Or call Air France Travelthèque at (212) 759-9550.

A Kelly tip: "After the summer is over, some of the world's great pinball players return to a few cafés in the Rue Washington area. Play them for the house specialty—hard-boiled eggs and beer."

IT'S BETTER IN THE BAHAMAS.

There are places where the sun is as warm as laughter. the sand is pure white and the sea is turquoise. Where it's easy to fall in love or fall in love all over again. And where, on your own secluded beach. you can lose yourselves and find each other.

The places are Nassau/Paradise Island, Freeport/Lucaya and The Out Islands of The Bahamas. And here are some packages and prices that make vacationing in The Bahamas better than ever.

What could be better than a week in Nassau/Paradise Island from $98 to $355.

Nassau/Paradise Island combines old-world charm with modern hotels, great restaurants, a casino and as much night life as you can stay up for. You can walk streets that Blackbeard the pirate walked. Shop in the quaint straw markets. Play tennis or golf. And soak up all the sun you can take on some of the most beautiful beaches you've ever seen. The price includes your air-conditioned hotel room for 8 days/7 nights, round-trip airport transfers, welcome cocktail and other extras. 4 day/3 night vacation packages are also available from $48 to $159.

Or a week in Freeport/Lucaya from $104 to $293.

Freeport/Lucaya offers you what very few vacation spots offer. Great day life combined with great night life. You can play golf on 6 courses, play tennis, go scuba diving or fish for the big ones. Shop in the International Bazaar for bargains or just relax in the warm sun on a white sand beach.

And at night there's El Casino, dining in gourmet restaurants and disco-hopping. The price includes your air-conditioned hotel room for 8 days/7 nights, welcome cocktail, sightseeing tour and other extras. 4 day/3 night vacation packages are also available from $48 to $129.

Or a week in The Out Islands from $88 to $402.

The Out Islands of The Bahamas may be just what you've been looking for in a vacation, but didn't think existed. Life is easygoing, relaxed and informal.

The food is excellent. And the people are warm and friendly. You can charter a boat and go fishing or island-hopping.

Or you can just lie on a perfect white sand beach that you have all to yourself. The $88 budget price includes air-conditioned accommodations for 8 days/7 nights and some extras. The $402 price includes more deluxe accommodations and breakfast and dinner daily. 4 day/3 night vacation packages are also available from $38 to $173.

See your Travel Agent.

These vacation prices are per person, double occupancy, and don't include air fare. We have many other vacation packages, some with special golf, tennis and scuba features.

The Northeast: Bedding For the Budget-Minded

Dozens of dormitories offer sleeping bag space, home cooking, maximum camaraderie and a bathroom down the hall.

By ROBERTA KAHN

Twenty bodies were laid out on two wooden shelves, much like a double-decker sardine can with down between the bodies instead of oil. I prayed that none were restless sleepers, and happily they weren't. I was in the women's sleeping bag loft on my first visit to the Bagatelle, a skiers' budget lodge, in Waitsfield in central Vermont.

Low on funds, I had called the Sugarbush lodging bureau. I wanted a place that was cheap, within reach of more than one ski area and near restaurants, night life and a grocery store. When the bureau suggested the Bagatelle, I signed up for a two-week stay in the loft. The price was right—$3 a night (it's going up to $4.25 this season)—and the location was good: three and a half miles from the Glen Ellen ski area, about six and a half from Sugarbush and five from Mad River. Five restaurants, a night spot, a movie theater and two shopping centers were within walking distance. Lacking a car, I was concerned about such things. (I hitchhiked to the slopes.)

Arriving with newly purchased sleeping bag in hand, I assessed my accommodations. Twenty inch-thick rubber mats neatly covered the two wooden shelves. I was the first arrival on that winter's afternoon and was able to choose an upper corner spot that gave me headroom and a whole wall to myself. There were no drawers, just 20 clothing hooks. I tried to imagine a groggy morning with 20 skiers all pulling at long johns, socks and ski pants from their suitcases on the floor.

The Bagatelle is one of dozens of ski dormitories sprinkled throughout New England, ranging from the plush variety hidden in higher priced lodges, charging around $20 a day with meals, to the real bargains where skiers pay as little as $3 a night for a sleeping bag spot. They offer dormitories with made-up beds, or bunks for sleeping bag guests—or both—and sometimes, as at the Bagatelle, private rooms as well. They have communal showers or shared bathrooms.

Some, like the Sugarloafers Ski Dorm, near the Sugarloaf ski area in Maine, include breakfast and dinner

At Large: Strategies For the Nonskier

Oh, to sit in crisp mountain air, drink in hand, listening to the distant snapping of femurs.

By PETER ANDREWS

The enchantments to be found during a week of skiing vary greatly with the individual. Some hearty souls enjoy the thrill of downhill racing, with the powder flying, while others prefer the contemplativeness of cross country. For myself, the principal pleasure I derive on such an outing always comes in the late afternoon when I can sit out in the crisp mountain air with a drink in my hand and listen to the snapping of femurs echoing from the distant hills, knowing each crack means that, come spring, there will be one less lunatic cluttering up the golf course.

You see, I do not ski. I never have skied and no power on earth can make me ski. If it comes to that, I do not see why anyone skis. For a person to push himself off the top of a cold mountain with a pair of overpriced barrel staves strapped to the bottoms of his feet strikes me as at best perverse. Whenever I go out on a ski outing, by the second or third day I always begin to feel like the beleaguered hero of an Alfred Hitchcock film. There I am, a perfectly innocent man trapped in a foreign land surrounded by people who speak a language I do not understand.

The reason I go on these outings at all is that I am married to a skier. Many years before I met her, my wife lived in Canada where she became obsessed by skiing. Her two brothers and their families are similarly afflicted. So once a year they all go off skiing and I tag along to look after the medical supplies. Each morning they rouse themselves at dawn like some crazed branch of the Trapp family singing Austrian sledging songs a cappela as they struggle with their bindings while I, whom the children have tagged as "kind of funny," stay in bed.

Last winter I found myself in the San Juan Mountains of Colorado, near Durango. While those who went skiing (at Purgatory Mountain, among other places) told me conditions were excellent, I can report conditions were also excellent for not skiing. And believe me, I know about not skiing at a ski resort. In my time I have not skied at Vail and Sun Valley. I have been to the Laurentians to not ski, and I have not skied all over Vermont and New Hampshire. Next year, one of my brothers-in-law, who does something important with stocks and bonds, is planning to lead us all to Gstaad, where I will not ski with the beautiful people.

I can hardly wait.

Except when skiers are ordering that winter abomination, hot buttered tequila, or seriously using expressions like "après ski," they are not an unpleasant lot. They are generally outgoing types who laugh and sing a great deal with the intensity of veterans who know the possibility of severe injury always faces them on the morrow. But a nonskier in their midst also finds himself in a perilous social situation, like someone with a Yugoslav name having lunch at the Brook Club. He may share the members' table, but he is not one of them.

A non-skier is forever being forced to explain himself. I have tried taking a high moral position about the natural superiority of people who do not willingly hurl themselves into snowbanks over those who do. But that is merely talking to the wind. They simply do not hear me. I have tried weaving some spurious excuse having to do with grievous wounds suffered in defense of flag and country which now prevent me from taking to the trails. But that never works. Skiers know someone who is afraid to ski when they see him.

The important thing I have discovered is that one should be absolutely firm in refusing to ski. Like most people who deep in their hearts realize they are doing something foolish,

LIFT-TICKET PRICES

A survey of this winter's lift-ticket rates indicates that many ski areas are charging no more than last year. A notable exception is Stowe, Vt., where the daily rate for adults has risen from $12 to $14 on both weekdays and weekends. "We had to do it to take care of increases in insurance, property tax, fuel and other costs," says an official at the resort. But there are ways to beat the 14 rate at Stowe. One is to buy a six-day ticket for $70 that not only permits use of all lifts on six consecutive days but also entitles the holder to three one-and-a-half-hour ski lessons a day —lessons that ordinarily cost $7 apiece. Regular visitors can join Stowe's Mount Mansfield Ski Club (Stowe, Vt. 05672) for $10, thus qualifying for lift tickets at $12 a day instead of $14. The membership fee for couples is $15 and for under-18's, $7.50.

Following are some other adult lift rates in Vermont (youngsters generally pay about two-thirds of the adult rate): Stratton, $12 on weekdays and $14 on weekends—each up $1; Mount Snow, $10 and $12—no increase. In New Hampshire, Mount Cranmore's rate has gone up $1 on weekdays to $8 but stays the same as last year on weekends, $10. In Massachusetts, Brodie Mountain is keeping the same rates: weekdays, $9; weekends, $11. Butternut Basin charges $9 (up $1) on weekdays and $11 (unchanged) on weekends. In New York, Hunter Mountain retains the same rate, $11 any day. There's no change either at state-operated Belleayre, $9 on weekdays and $10 on weekends, or at McCauley Mountain in Old Forge, $5 weekdays, $6 weekends.

In New Jersey the Great Gorge and Vernon Valley areas, which are under the same management, are staying with $10 on weekdays and $12 on weekends. In Pennsylvania there's no change at Camelback, $9 and $11. But at Ski Roundtop the ticket has risen to $8 from $7 on weekdays and to $10 from $9.50 on weekends.

Out West, Sun Valley, Idaho, is maintaining its any-day rate of $11. Park City, Utah, has raised its any-date rate to $10 from $9.

FLIGHTS TO CANADA

A "Skifari" air fare offered by Air Canada gives skiers a saving of about 30 percent over regular economy fares to the Canadian Rockies—so long as ground arrangements are also purchased. One can fly to Calgary or Edmonton in Alberta for $231 and to Vancouver for $263, round trip from New York. Calgary is the gateway to the Banff and Lake Louise group of ski areas; Edmonton is for Marmot Basin and Vancouver is for the more challenging Whistler's Mountain. A week in Banff/Lake Louise or near Marmot Basin costs $117 to $174, including six nights accommodations, five days of lift tickets and bus transfers. A week at Whistler's Mountain, including car rental as well as accommodations and lift tickets, is $175 to $218.

THE FREESTYLE TREND

Freestyle skiing—acrobatic stunts that until a couple of seasons ago were the prerogative of a handful of experts —is now going public. The showy, snowy tricks of freestyle will be taught at many ski areas across the country this season, and special training camps are being set up to offer instruction.

Canadian Mountain Holidays

Helicopter skiers in the Monashees, Canada

For example, Hunter Mountain is organizing a formal program. It starts Dec. 18 and will include training in stunt ballet, mogul skiing and aerials. In addition, a training camp will be held at Hunter during the week starting Dec. 27, and skiers who prove themselves proficient will be able to compete in the Eastern circuit of freestyle competitions. A coach and chaperone will accompany contestants to all events. Some of these competitions, sanctioned by the Eastern Ski Association, are to be held at Hunter, whose head coach for freestyle is Barclay Moore, a professionally certified ski instructor and freestyle judge. "The emphasis," he says, "will be on fun and safety."

Freestyle camps are scheduled to open at several ski areas, including Killington, Stratton and Glen Ellen in Vermont; Pleasant Mountain, Me.; Brodie Mountain and Jiminy Peak in Massachusetts; Holiday Valley, Catamount and Scotch Valley in New York, and Attitash and Pat's Peak in New Hampshire. Most will open Christmas week.

Among upcoming special freestyle meets are the New York State championships at Greek Peak on Feb. 5, the Vermont championships at Stratton on Feb. 12-13 and the New Hampshire championships at Black Mountain on Jan. 8-9.

ALPINE OPPORTUNITIES

Travelers bound for the Alps can combine a ski trip with a look at the pre-Lenten Fasching celebrations in Munich, says Swissair. There are Thursday flights from New York from late January to mid-February that will allow the skier to spend a Friday and Saturday in Munich, then make a getaway on Sunday to the Austrian resort of Kitzbuhel. Two-week vacationers can then go on to other resorts in Austria or Switzerland. There's an extra charge for the Munich weekend, which comes with a sightseeing tour and various discounts, of $70 to $115, according to the hotel used.

Here are some examples, from Swissair, of what a European ski package, with air fare from New York included, costs. Klosters, with a two-star hotel and breakfasts, $572; Grindelwald, three-star hotel, with breakfasts and dinners, $617; Verbier, three-star hotel with breakfasts and dinners, $697 ($1,098 for two weeks); Davos, four-star hotel with two meals a day, $727 (two weeks, with the second week at a four-star hotel in St. Anton, $1,098).

Air France has scheduled weekly Saturday departures to French ski resorts via Geneva through April 24. Packages, including air fare, transfers from the airport, seven nights at a two-star hotel or in a studio apartment with breakfasts and a six-day lift pass, start at $495, double occupancy.

Club Mediterranee has opened a winter sports village, at Wengen in Switzerland. The resort is near the foot of the Jungfrau slopes and accommodates 400 persons in twin-bedded rooms. A club restaurant high on the Kleine Scheidegg mountain serves lunches (with unlimited wine). The club's ski school will be running two-hour classes morning and afternoon for all levels as part of its one-week vacation package, which costs $234 to $339 per person a week and includes two meals a day and lift tickets. Add the G.I.T. air fare: $374.

All instruction at the village is in French.

CROSS-COUNTRY EVENTS

The Bill Koch Ski League (named for the Olympic silver medalist from Vermont) is being launched this season. Sponsored by the Travelers Insurance Companies in conjunction with the Eastern Ski Association, it is designed to give youngsters under the age of 13 an opportunity to learn the fundamentals of cross-country skiing through low-key competition. The league will be organized around local teams in 10 geographic areas of the Northeast. Plans call for the teams to compete in dozens of ski meets, with races over distances of about 2.5 to 5 kilometers, or about 1½ to 3 miles.

The Eastern Ski Association is also helping to organize 27 cross-country races that are open to participation by people of all ages. Among them are: the Holiday Festival Cross-Country Citizens Race (about 6 miles) at Country Hills Farm, Tully, N.Y., on Jan. 2; the Travelers Derby (about 6 miles) at Salisbury, Conn., Jan. 16; the Winter Festival Citizens Rally (about 6 miles) at Stratton Mountain, Vt., Jan. 29; the Paul Revere Cup Race (about 9 miles) at Fort Devens, Mass., Jan. 30, and the Dartmouth Winter Carnival Citizens' Classic (about 9 miles) at Dartmouth, N. H., Feb. 10.

In addition, the E.S.A. is involved in the 1977 United States National Cross-Country Championships to be held at Lyndonville and Burke Mountain in Vermont from Jan. 23 to 29. Members of the United States team, including Bill Koch, will compete. Included in the schedule are events up to 50 kilometers (about 30 miles) for men and up to 20 kilometers for women as well as relay events for both men and women. Junior events will be used to select a United States team for the World Junior Championships at St. Croix, Switzerland, Feb. 18-20.

Training techniques for cross-country skiing as well as the "mental energy" requirements of competition are described in a manual written by Koch that is being distributed free by the E.S.A. For a copy of the manual and for details on the Bill Koch League and the various cross-country competitions, contact the E.S.A. at 22 High Street, Brattleboro, Vt. 05301 (802-254-6077).

THE STUDENT SCENE

A growing winter vacation force is the Student Ski Association, which organizes low-cost packages called "carnivals" during the mid-semester school break and the spring exam period. It now has close to 50,000 members and the annual membership fee is $7. Many of the members will make their way to the New England carnivals that the S.S.A. is planning this season. They cost around $95 and provide a week's accommodations, breakfasts and dinners, five days of lift tickets and a lively social schedule that includes wine and cheese parties. Members also get discounts on ski lessons. Carnivals in the Northeast will be held in the Mount Washington Valley area in New Hampshire, Jan. 2-7; Mount Snow, Vt., Jan. 2-7, Jan. 9-14 and Jan. 16-21; Waterville Valley and other New Hampshire ski areas, Jan. 9-14. Among other carnivals is one at Steamboat, Colo., Jan. 2-9, that will cost about $320, including air fare from New York and bed and board. Similar packages are scheduled for Vail, Colo., in March and April, and weekend events are being planned for Boyne Mountain and other ski areas in Michigan. Contact the Student Ski Association at 233 North Pleasant Street, Amherst, Mass. 01002 (tel.: 413-253-3206).

CHARTER FLIGHTS

Five charter flights (O.T.C.'s) to Jackson Hole, Wyo., and Sun Valley, Idaho, via the Idaho Falls Airport have been arranged by a tour operator called WIST, Inc. (46 Maple Avenue, Morristown, N. J. 07960: tel.: 201-539-9034). WIST stands for Wyoming-Idaho Ski Tours. The trips will take place in January and February and range in price from $299 to $368, double occupancy. The rates include round-trip air transportation by T.W.A. from Newark, seven nights at the Crystal Springs Inn or Sojourner Inn in Jackson Hole or the Elkhorn Village Inn in Sun Valley. Options include six days of lift tickets from $56. Lower package rates are available for groups of three or four. A group of four persons taking the Sun Valley trip would pay $309 each.

SNOWFLAKES

Killington, Vt., which began its season on Oct. 27 with skiing on man-made snow, has added a 4,400-foot double chairlift called the Needle's Eye. . . . A new access trail at Stowe, Vt., enables skiers to cut across the slopes to the gondola lift without having to descend the steep Nosedive Trail. . . . Mount Cranmore, N. H., has extended its snowmaking system to the top of the mountain. . . . Camelback in the Poconos has installed additional lighting for night skiing, enabling skiers to use two trails instead of one from the top. . . . Great Gorge, N.J., is opening a six-mile cross-country trail in its northern section. . . . A new chairlift, named Seattle Ridge, on Baldy Mountain, Sun Valley, will open up a side of the mountain noted for getting the most from passing storms. . . . Gray Rocks in the Canadian Laurentians has opened up the east side of its mountain with a new chairlift and the extension of existing trails. The resort has also increased its snowmaking coverage by 30 percent.

Bromley Sun Lodge, a new 51-room hotel at Bromley, Vt., is close to the main chairlift and has a huge sundeck. . . . The ski school at Glen Ellen, Vt., is using a device called a Ski Bra, which holds the beginner's ski tips in a wedge or snowplow position. . . . Official opening date at both Big Boulder and Jack Frost Mountain in the Poconos is Dec. 5. Jack Frost is to have a learn-to-ski program for amputees Jan. 18-20. . . . ock off from Madras with a river and our guide Jacob, a bright-eyed, 23-year-old law who was picking up a few during his winter vacation. Al- a Christian, which accounted biblical name, he proved to be unded in Hindu matters. Just the city we passed a Hindu procession. Followed by s on foot, the body lay on a n borne by four men. "He must have ich man to afford a car," said They are going to the crema- unds a mile and half from he body will be burned on a pyre lit by the eldest son. If very rich man, the pyre will ndalwood." The funeral put properly thoughtful mood for le tour.

seven miles south, on a road bordered with feathery trees, we approached the Mahabalipuram, overlooking of Bengal. Mahabalipuram was ort of the Palava kings who region about 1,300 years ago. y built the earliest stone tem- he south, all in a span of 50 tween A.D. 630 and 680. And it to last: monolithic temples rom a single piece of rock; ls carved on the face of the ive temples hollowed out of s. Earlier temples of wood, fore the Pallavas, have long nished.

The largest bas-relief in ld—90 feet long and 30 feet is an extraordinary work of ting a legend from the Mahab- epic. Here is the drama, in a prince who appeals to Siva against his enemies. More figures hewn out of the rock, alike, include Arjuna doing his a heroic Siva with dwarfish its, a band of angels flying to ne, a herd of elephants (one long) and other animals of the A comic tomcat stands up- one leg; and nearby, in the a stone monkey delouses his other Mahabalipuram site, one ve monolithic rathas—temples form of chariots—each carved single rock, each in an individu- , but all writhing with sculp- f broad-shouldered gods and vaisted goddesses. Life-size, nding figures of an elephant, a bull and a lion mount guard. The sculptors started from the top of a rock outcropping, carving downward, chiseling away the rock to leave the temples and figures standing. Jacob showed us traces of the original rows of drill holes into which wooden pegs were inserted, then soaked in hot water so they would expand and split off the rock.

The most prominent monument, the Mahabalipuram Shore Temple, lies on a sandy point, its outer ramparts washed by the waves. It is constructed of granite blocks—not carved out of solid rock like the others. Above the main sanctuary, a truncated pyramid reaches into the sky; the Pallavas were believed to have built it as a beacon to sailors. Late in the afternoon, the slanting sun picks out the weather-worn temple sculptures, turning them coral pink. Several parties of Indian visitors wandered over the ruins—Tamil women, erect and graceful in the brilliant saris of the south, large families with solemn children, newlyweds, a group of youthful pilgrims with shaven heads. Within sight on a distant shore rises a nuclear power plant under construction—symbol of another India.

The next morning we headed for our second site, Kanchipuram, called Kanchi for short, 40 miles into the interior. Along the way we stopped to stare up at a 500-foot hill topped by a Siva temple. The town is Thirukalikundrum. There, every day about noon, the temple priest feeds a pair of kites that, so the story goes, fly in from the holy city of Varinasi (Benares), about 1,000 miles away. Jacob said, "Myself, I have seen the kites after eating fly off to the surrounding hills. On the other hand," he added, "only two birds come, no more, and it has been that way from time immemorial. They never bring their friends."

Kanchipuram, once known as the city of 1,200 temples, was the ancient capital of the Pallavas, and it is one of the seven holy cities in India. An earnest little pamphlet for sale at the site lists 181 sizable temples still standing. Three serve as a fair sample. The oldest, the Kailasanatha Temple, dates from the eighth century. Built of soft sandstone by the Pallavas, it is now partially in ruins, but it still contains a working Siva shrine. The temple priest, showing us two rock-carved images, said: "Siva and Parvati are having a dance contest. See how Siva is kicking one leg higher than his head. But Parvati is a shy, modest lady, so she is not kicking her leg so high. Siva is winning." Indeed, Siva wears a small, triumphant smile, and Parvati looks positively demure.

The Vadaraja Temple, dedicated to Vishnu the Preserver, dates in part to the 12th century, the time of the Chola kings, but successive rulers have embellished it many times. Its 125-foot gopuram, or gate tower, contains carved wooden doors 40 feet high. They lead to a courtyard where the chained temple elephant this time wears the sign of Vishnu on his forehead—a white U with a vertical red line through the middle. The priests wear the same mark. Most Hindus belong to either the Vaishnavite or Saivite sect—followers of either Vishnu or Siva.

In the hall of Karma the turtle—Vishnu's second incarnation—a huge platform on carved turtle legs supports the image of the god. Sometimes called the Hall of 100 Columns, the building contains only 96, Jacob carefully pointed out. Each is chiseled from a single block of granite adorned with fanciful figures: Yali, a mythical lion with horns; rearing horses, symbol of the kings who built the hall; acrobats forming a pyramid. There are a few mildly erotic sculptures—panels from that early sex manual, the Kama Sutra—"because the temple is a place of education," explained Jacob, "and that includes sex education."

But in this city, Siva the Destroyer has it over Vishnu with the monumental high-rise temple, Ekambareswara. Its main gopuram, built in 1509, soars 11 stories—188 feet. The number and variety of beggars who inhabit the courtyard seemed appalling: a woman with rudimentary legs and feet, an aged blind man led by a child, victims of elephantiasis. They were all professionals, plying a trade sanctioned by custom, at a high-traffic spot. "People feel generous when they leave the temple," said Jacob.

Inside, along the temple corridors or within shrines, stand no fewer than 108 lingams—truncated stone columns symbolizing Siva, who is also the god of reproduction. Some guidebooks, putting it delicately, say that the lingam symbolizes abstract energy, the life force. It is, in fact, a phallus. In a rear courtyard a giant mango tree grows, an unauthenticated 3,500 years old. Barren couples who want children use it as a wishing tree. Some wishes come true: around the tree hang cradles—votive offerings from grateful parents.

We drove back 50 miles to Madras to spend the night and catch a 6:30 A.M. plane for Madurai—third and most stupendous temple site of all. About 300 miles southwest of Madras, Madurai is one of India's oldest cities, founded in the sixth century B.C. Today it is a thriving commercial town of more than half a million. Smack in the center of the bustling throngs stands the Meenakshi Temple, built chiefly between 1550 and 1650, although parts of it may go back 2,500 years. This architectural confection of 11 towering gopurams and sprawling mandapams, or temple halls, covers more than 15 acres. The entire complex looks as if it were decorated by a pastry cook who went mad studying Hindu mythology; its polychrome colors, freshly laid on in 1963, rival those of Coney Island's Luna Park in its looniest days.

Meenakshi means "the goddess with eyes like a fish," i.e., beautifully curved, from meen, the Tamil word for fish. She is one of the forms of the goddess Parvati, the bride of Siva. Through her temple's hospitable corridors pour some 10,000 worshipers a day, up to 13,000 on festive days. The place seethes with life—the coming and going of pilgrims, the wedding parties in their embroidered finery, the daily devotions of rich and poor. Non-believers may wander freely around the vast temple halls, as long as they take off their shoes and hats; they are barred only from the innersanctums of Meenakshi and Siva.

Inside the temple's East Gate we found rows of commercial stalls; sweets and fruit stands with bananas and coconuts; about 50 feet of tables piled with garlands of fresh flowers for offerings; open-front shops stocked with bangles, beads, toys, aluminum pots and pans; one stand selling hair falls "because some ladies are not having enough natural hair," explained our escort, K. Dharmarajan, a fortyish functionary from the Tamil Nadu tourist office in Madurai. He piloted us around with a rapid-fire commentary, punctuated by throat clearings, head bobbings and amiable smiles.

In the middle of the entrance corridor we encountered a figure of Nandi the bull, Siva's mount, blackened from the touch of devotees who stroke the statue, then touch their foreheads. Surrounded by a pillared portico, the Tank of the Golden Lily, a 165-by-120-foot sunken pool has broad flights of steps that lead down to the water. Here, worshipers purify themselves before entering the sanctuary. Some stand on the steps and perfunctorily dip their hands and feet in the olive-green water; others descend waist deep, scoop up water, splash it over their faces, wash out their mouths. One white-bearded old man, wearing only a G-string, dunked himself repeatedly, washing his hair and scrubbing all over. "The water is very good for skin diseases," observed Dharmarajan. According to legend, the tank once had another mysterious virtue—testing the literary merit of new works. Poor manuscripts would sink if placed in the water; those of value floated.

From the open portico of the temple tank we could see the overpowering South Gate, nine stories—160 feet high, as well as other gopurams, all richly ornamented with sculptures. The upper stories run to rampant, painted-plaster figures of deities, temple guards, demons. Two great copper domes plated with gold rise above the central sanctuaries. At the top of two gopurams enormous twin dragons stand guard with bared fangs.

Before entering the main temple hall most worshipers smear their foreheads with ash from a pit surmounted by a figure of the elephant god, Ganesha. Inside the hall, next to the entrance to Meenakshi's shrine, a cashier's cage does a brisk business. Above it hangs a blackboard listing in Tamil a schedule of fees for making offerings to the goddess or commissioning prayers; they range from half a rupee (6 cents) to 125 rupees ($15). For 20 feet along the wall a huge bird cage stretches, alive with screeching parrots, Meenakshi's favorite bird. A public-address system delivers a constant, high-pitched chanting of prayers. Small children lurk by the bird cage and add their voices to the uproar.

Many worshipers perform their pujas, or prayers, before the lesser deities whose images are scattered throughout the temple. A man with snow-white hair circled a columnar idol exactly 20 times, then prostrated himself flat on his belly. Another clasped his hands above his head and gyrated slowly with his eyes closed. Before a figure of Hanuman, the monkey god, stands a bowl of kumkum, the sacred red powder; devotees dip their fingers in the bowl, smear kumkum on the god's muzzle, then on their foreheads. "Hanuman is worshiped for good strength," said our escort. A figure of a female deity with eight arms is thickly spattered with butter, dabbed on as an offering against fever. The mingled odors of well-aged butter, burning camphor and flower offerings hang in the air.

A rationale for these complicated devotions, if any is needed after some 3,500 years, may be found in the Hall of 1,000 Pillars (985 to be exact) now an art museum in the north sector of the Meenakshi Temple. Here a visitor views, among a spate of splendid bronze and stone sculptures, an educational exhibit on iconography. It announces its theme with this inscription in English as well as Tamil:

"Image worship has served a very useful purpose of stimulating devotion and promoting religious art. To the unevolved this is the only way of inculcating in them physical and mental disciplines basically necessary for spiritual emancipation."

We returned from the Meenakshi Temple, drained physically and mentally by the experience. Late in the afternoon, an elephant turned up in the hotel rose garden. The mahout was tinkling a bell by way of advertising, and he offered to take us for a ride, "for whatever you want to give." We turned him down, suspecting that an elephant ride would be tame fare after the Meenakshi Temple.

If You Go . . .

. . . to South India to see the Hindu temples, you can fly to Madras from New York on a round-trip excursion fare, good 14 to 120 days, for $835. The additional round trip from Madras to Madurai is $40.80. You can also fly all over India on a "Discover India" ticket, good for 14 days, offered by Indian Airlines, for $200.

The best season to visit is October to March; winter temperatures in Madras average about 78 degrees, summer temperatures about 85.

There are a number of fine hotels in Madras (all rooms are air-conditioned). At the new deluxe Taj Coromandel rates are $15.60 to $24 single, $21.60 to $30 double. The new, first-class Chola has, of all things, an ice-skating rink in the basement. A single room costs $12 to $18, a double $18 to $21.60. The traditional Connemara has been completely refurbished, with a new wing added. Singles run $13.20 to $14.40, doubles $19.80 to $21. Fine cuisine, both western and Indian, can be had at the Sudarsan International, where a single room costs $10.20 to $15.60 and a double $16.20 to $22.80. A 10 percent service charge is usually added to the hotel bill.

Temple Bay Hotel in Mahabalipuram has air-conditioned bungalows: single, $8.40; double, $13.20.

At the Pandyan Hotel in Madurai, a single costs $7.20, a double $10.80 to $14.40. Rooms are air-conditioned.

It's hard to spend more than $5 for a meal in a hotel dining room. For example, a sumptuous Sunday buffet at the Chola, with both Western and Indian dishes, costs $3.60. Tamil Nadu is a dry state, but tourists may buy drinks in hotel bars, called "permit rooms," by presenting a tourist liquor permit obtained from a Government of India Tourist Office.

For tours from Madras to the three temple sites, by private car or coach, contact India Tourism Development Corporation, 35 Mount Road, Madras 2, tel: 88520. The two-day trip by private car with driver begins at 7:30 A.M. the first day and ends at 7:30 P.M. the next. A car takes up to four passengers and costs $36. A one-day conducted coach tour with an English-speaking guide starts at 7:30 A.M. and ends at 6 P.M. The cost is $2.64 per person, breakfast and lunch extra.

Rates for a private guide in Madras are as follows: half day, $2.16; full day, $4.20; overnight stay, $5.40. We found that the guides recommended by the Government of India Tourist Office in principal cities were informed and articulate.

How to Get the Maximum Out of Not Skiing

skiers are great proselytizers. At the first sign of weakness, they will have you out on the practice slopes making a fool of yourself. Firmness is the only answer. Simply say, "I do not ski," and walk away quickly, leaving them to ponder the inconceivable.

In addition to affording perfect safety, not skiing at a ski resort can be immensely pleasurable. When the slopes are jammed it usually means the shops are uncluttered, the non-ski-oriented sights are easily reachable and the saloons are inhabited by sensible people who have something more interesting to talk about than the density of snowflakes on some menacing escarpment nearby.

Last winter we stayed at a resort complex called Tamarron, a fairly new concept in such pleasure domes. It is actually a series of condominium rooms, suites and separate housing units. Investors looking for a tax shelter can buy anything from an efficiency apartment to a completely furnished three-bedroom villa at prices ranging from $40,000 to more than $155,000. This is a real estate investment that gives the purchasers the right to live in their own quarters for periods of up to one month a year while receiving the usual tax benefits. The rest of the time Tamarron rents out their units for them.

Operations like this intrigue my brother-in-law, but have only marginal interest for me. However, I did look around at some of the higher ticket items, not with any intention of buying, but just because I like to spend an idle half-hour with smoothly turned-out men in blue blazers discussing the tax advantages of my laying out a hundred grand or so for a ski hut in the Colorado mountains. When a man is always a month behind on his bill at the local liquor store back home, conversations like that are balm for the soul. I really don't know how good a deal Tamarron would be for inestors, but it does afford the short-stay guest a reasonable bargain. All of the accommodations are first class, and a more than pleasant double room with its own kitchen facilities is available for $44 a day.

I used to be a fairly good sulker on ski vacations, but my wife, Marjorie, who is descended from a long and distinguished line of English press-gang leaders, will have none of that. When she goes on vacation she insists that everyone see the maximum amount of action.

"Now, don't sit around the room all day watching television," is her standard departing remark every morning. "For heaven's sake, go out and do something."

What I went out and did may strike skiers as prosaic, but it suited me fine. I always made it a point to stay well snuggled up until long after they had left for the mountains, and managed to amble down for breakfast just under the wire. After a hearty meal I shared the largely deserted indoor pool with the halt and the recently lamed, and then went for a steam bath and massage. After a vigorous half-hour in the game room working over a particularly forgiving pinball machine, I was alert enough in mind and body to make it to the bar for a Bloody Mary. It may not sound like much of a morning to you, but I found it restful, pleasant and safe.

Dedicated skiers, of course, will not come off the slopes until dusk, so I generally have the afternoons to myself to poke around town.

Each ski resort area has its own personality and the life of a nonskier varies accordingly. Sun Valley is still the grande dame of resorts, where the accommodations are so refined they have indoor horseback riding for people who don't want to get even a single breath of fresh air. The Sun Valley Lodge is a coolly elegant pile that offers tea every afternoon complete with a harpist playing old Harpo Marx numbers. Somebody famous or rich is always flying in from somewhere and there is a constant air of excitement about the place. Everybody looks like somebody you feel you should know. I like Sun Valley, but I always get the feeling I should be at attention.

Vail and Aspen are somewhat vigorously snobbish—people there check the brand names on your equipment the way prep school kids used to look at the labels in their classmates' clothes—but are generally more relaxed than Sun Valley, especially if you are not on a first-name basis with the Kennedys. Vail is a bit more staid but Aspen is like a nonstop homecoming week at college and if you like to dance with girls who wear ski boots it can be a lot of fun.

Strangely enough, not even Aspen is a patch on Vermont for what in singles bars is called "the action." I was not permitted to check this out entirely, but I have been told and my own observation seemed to confirm the theory that the area around Mount Snow contains the world's most concentrated supply of singles doing whatever it is that singles do. Several of the young men who prowl this particular turf have told me they don't even bring skis with them, because "there's no time for that kind of stuff."

In its own way, Durango is a particularly good place for a nonskier. History rests easily on the town, and it is possible to combine shopping for Western gear and Indian crafts with a historical walking tour all at the same time. My favorite places in Durango, however, are the cowboy bars. The local cowboys tend to be a fairly hard-nosed bunch who like a smooth drink and a rough story, and have a contempt for skiers which is all-pervasive.

I stopped off at the Golden Horseshoe just outside of town to watch the Dallas Cowboys on the tube, and ran into a leather-faced man named Cal with a black Stetson pushed over his eyes. He was looking out of the window and saw a ski bus heading for Purgatory Mountain.

"My God-amighty, you'd have to pay me a great deal of money to get me up there sliding around on that Sierra cement," he said.

I decided Cal was my kind of guy and it took three Coors—the most overrated beverage this side of pink champagne—before I could make h[illegible] realize that although I may talk li[illegible] an effete Easterner, at least I was n[illegible] a skier.

Cal's family has lived around Dura[illegible] go for generations, and he fond[illegible] remembers the days before the infl[illegible] of summer and winter people, wh[illegible] the primary form of entertainment [illegible] the mountains was the Saturday nig[illegible] fist fight. Cal keeps up the old wa[illegible]

"I was over in Cortez last nigh[illegible]" Cal told me, "and Mother of Mer[illegible] I had me a good fight."

He opened his mouth and proud[illegible] showed me two missing teeth, the r[illegible]sult of the previous evening's ent[illegible]tainment.

"I don't rightly remember wh[illegible] started it," he explained. "I think [illegible] had something to do with me bei[illegible] drunk and another man's wife w[illegible] I mistook for someone else. But it su[illegible] was a good fight. You always get [illegible] good fight in Cortez."

Cal and I swapped improbabiliti[illegible] for the rest of the afternoon and [illegible] early evening we found that one [illegible] the freakish snowfalls that are co[illegible]mon in the area had come down, te[illegible]porarily cutting us off from Tamarr[illegible] and the slopes above. I checked in a[illegible] found that Marjorie and the rest [illegible] the family were still out there som[illegible]where. The people at Tamarron offer[illegible] to send a heavy-duty vehicle to ta[illegible] me back, but Cal and I agreed it w[illegible] better to stick it out at the Gold[illegible] Horseshoe. We decided that if n[illegible] family didn't show up by April, the[illegible] by God, we'd just have to go out the[illegible] in those mountains and start looki[illegible] for them.

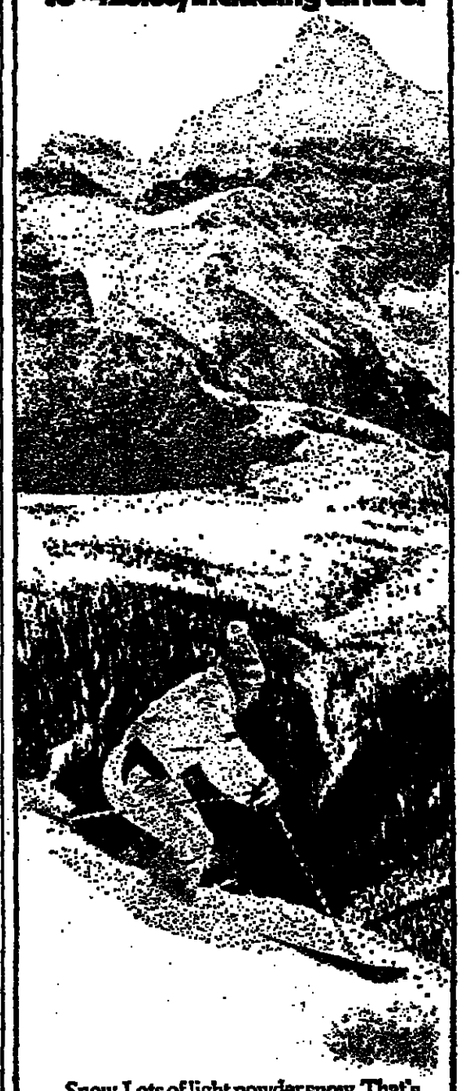
Our West is best.

Air Canada's Rockies. More snow. Fewer crowds. Shorter lines. Longer season. For as little as $366.85 to $423.85, including airfare.



Snow. Lots of light powder snow. That's what the Canadian Rockies are all about.

Covering majestic mountains like Mt. Norquay with its exhilarating 8,248 ft. run.

Filling the vast bowls of Sunshine Village.

Blanketing Jasper's Marmot Basin, with its Bunny Hop and thrilling Spill Way.

You'll want more time skiing, and less time waiting on lines. And you'll get it. Because our West is what the "wide-open spaces" are all about.

With areas like Lake Louise—Canada's largest, boasting 2 mountains with 8 faces, so you can follow the sun all day. And Whistler Mountain with the longest (4,280 ft.) vertical drop in North America.

And the snow keeps falling from November till May, making our ski season last and last.

You can ski West young man, (or woman), for as little as $366.85 to $423.85 per person, including airfare and taxes, depending on accommodations and length of stay. Our basic package offers six nights (double occupancy) in Banff or Lake Louise. Included are airport transfers, five days of lift tickets and bus transfers to and from ski areas.

Ski the Canadian Rockies just once and you'll see why we say "Our West is Best."

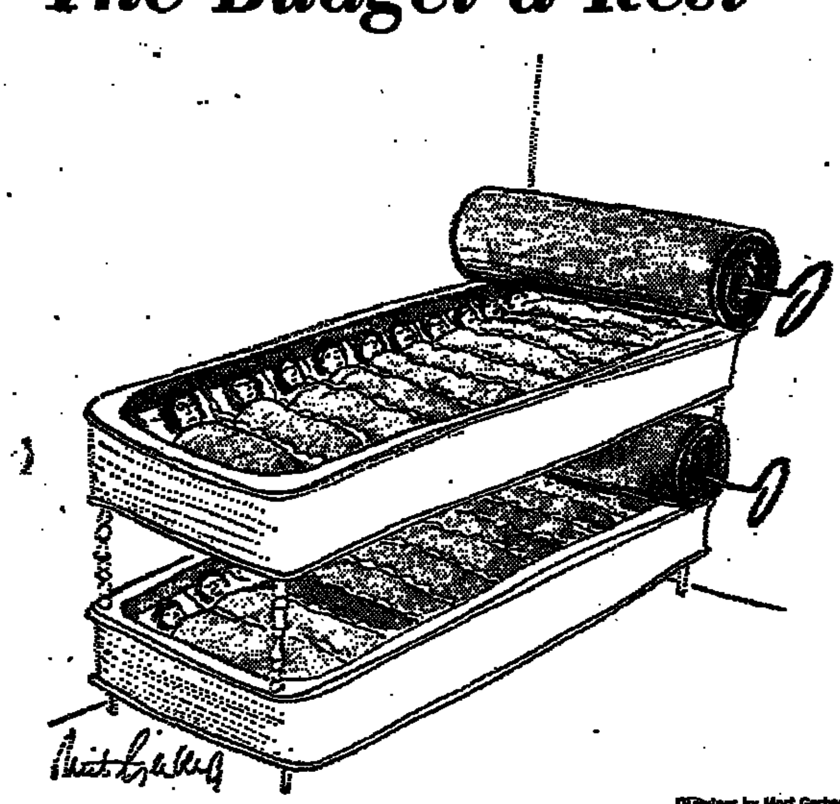
Ski Dorms: Giving The Budget a Rest



Drawings by Mort Gerberg

"... a double-decker sardine can with down between the bodies instead of oil."

at an inclusive rate—$9. At the Sugarloafers, skiers bed down in a loghouse and dine in a dome-shaped urethane foam structure heated electrically. Breakfast fare includes pancakes and sausages, and dinner menus include chicken with all the fixings and spaghetti and meatballs. Other budget lodges, like the Scottie Skiers Home in Stowe, where Perry and Helen Nay have welcomed skiers for 28 years, don't serve meals but provide cooking facilities. Guests at Scottie's, an old white house at the edge of the village, whip up their meals on an electric plate and have the use of pots and pans, dishes and a refrigerator.

What often happens in a budget lodge with a variety of accommodations is that the thrifty skier is first attracted by a cheap bag space and then graduates, first to a dormitory, then to a double with shared bath and finally to a double with private bath. A range of accommodations draws an assortment of skiers: families, middle-aged types, young couples, singles of all ages and divorced parents with children. At the exclusively low-cost lodges, the clientele is apt to be primarily high school and college students.

The Bagatelle—my favorite—has a mixed crowd. It also offers optional meals and a homey atmosphere. As one drives up to it from State Route 100 it looks like a typical white clapboard Vermont house with screened-in porch. From the side it looks as if the original had been multiplied by three in length only, which is the way it happened. The main house was completed in 1829 and at one time was the Waitsfield Meeting House. The 137-year-old barn houses the lounge, game room and some of the lodging.

The property changed hands seven times before it became a ski lodge 17 years ago. The present proprietors are Mike and Elaine Cunningham, formerly of Hackensack, N.J., who bought the place with two other couples in 1970. They have added more private rooms, a three-bedroom apartment and a Colonial-style fireplace made of local stone.

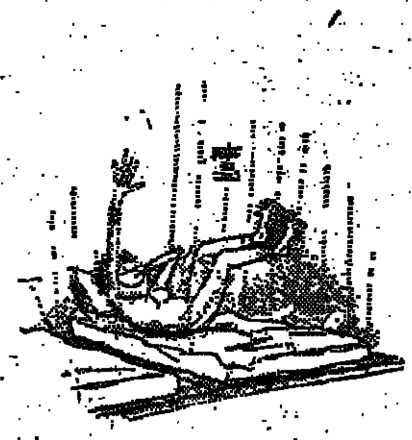
On busy weekends the Cunninghams have as many as 115 guests: 40 men and 20 women in bag spaces; 11 men, six women and four of one sex or the other (whoever signs on first) in the dormitories ($6); eight persons in doubles with private bath ($8.00 to $10 a person); 20 in doubles with shared baths ($7.52 a person), and the three-bedroom apartment, with fully equipped kitchen, which rents for $85 a day on a five-day basis. (The address of the lodge is Waitsfield, Vt. 05673; tel: 802-496-3979.)

In such tight quarters respect for privacy and consideration for others has got to be the rule. Even those in doubles have to realize that the walls are thin. I was surprised at first how everyone in the loft (and in the women's dorm) kept to her own area or hook (unless, of course, the others were empty). Gradually I came to expect it. People go out of their way to be quiet and use as little light as possible if they come in late.

There is no curfew but rules against drinking or smoking dope in the rooms are strictly enforced. Offenders are thrown out on the spot.

A sampling of the lodgers during my last trip included regulars Dave Pollack, a 56-year-old attorney; his wife, Sally, 48; their daughter Aimee, 15, and her cousin Jay, 17, from Secaucus, N.J. (the couple shared a double, the kids were in dorms); Susan and Wendy Meyers, 19 and 16, students, from Scarsdale, N. Y. (dorm) and the Earth Keepers, a group of 14 boys and girls from the Yorktown (Westchester) High School ecology club who went cross-country skiing every day (lofts).



"An upper corner gave me headroom and a whole wall to myself."

During my first stay I was on my own but made friends in the loft. Since we had little money, we hung around together in the evenings in the barn's game room, playing with puzzles and sharpening our skis in its workshop—the old horse stalls. We got to know the others at mealtime.

For breakfast there's homemade corn or banana bread (35 cents) or blueberry muffins (25 cents) baked by Elaine at 6:30 each morning for 7:30 eating. Two mini waffles, popped into the oven from the freezer, go for 75 cents, and then there are juices, coffee, tea and toast with jam. Dinners range from 99 cents (tuna fish casserole) to $2.95 (lasagna, including garlic bread and salad). Goulash, spaghetti and meatballs, baked chicken legs, meat loaf and roast beef sandwiches cost about $2. Soup and salad are also available.

Beverages (soft) are sold with dinner, and guests can bring their own beer and wine. A separate refrigerator is available for storage but there are no cooking facilities. Elaine does all the cooking and Mike and two live-in ski bums serve. Tipping is optional.

Conquering the Alps: Not for Experts Only

Beginner Europeans need easy practice slopes, and you will find them, often very close to some of those same intimidating peaks. One of the best easy areas I've seen is the glacier field at the foot of the Matterhorn near Zermatt; it is just as smooth and gently angled as a beach. Imagine the spiritual lift, imagine how much easier those early strains and tumbles are, if when you pull yourself up, you can pause a moment and stare at sun-shot clouds settling around the Matterhorn's neck.

I found beginner-slope skiing in the Alps actually easier than most of what I'd tried out in the United States, for an unexpected reason: no trees. Nearly all the ski areas in the Alps are above the tree line, above the altitude where trees grow. One thing you do not have to worry about is crashing into a tree —no small psychological lift in those early stages, when one of the recurring questions is, How do I stop?

Once you are out of beginner level, once you have shed the snowplow maneuver along with early pervasive awkwardness, and are able to handle moderately steep terrain, then your choices in the Alps suddenly expand to nearly limitless options. Each resort has a variety of runs that you never dreamed possible back on your friendly New England mountain. You can begin to take advantage of the size of the Alps.

Some Alpine resorts, by design or nature, are indeed mostly suitable for beginners and intermediates, and Europeans who prefer moderate terrain flock to them.

Megève and Courchevel in France, for example, both offer miles of open, very easy skiing, and both were planned that way. They even groom their slopes, unusual for Europe, where snowcats are used to level the runs (pistes) after a snowfall, but where, compared with, say, Colorado, much less attention is given to grooming. Not surprisingly, both Megève and Courchevel attract skiers who care somewhat more about their snow-tans and their après-ski options than the perfection of their parallel turns.

Arosa, over in the southeastern corner of Switzerland, offers some 40 miles of ski runs. Nearly all of it is intermediate and lower. The resort also has a number of small hills that are used for novice practice and beginner classes. Indeed, the easygoing slopes and the charm of the village of Arosa have combined to give the place a romantic reputation.

The Eiger and the Jungfrau and several other peaks, all revered by mountain climbers, loom over the Swiss village of Grindelwald. And yet, if you take the cog railway up from Grindelwald to Kleine Scheidegg, a point in front of and roughly in between the Eiger and the Jungfrau, what lies below, all the way back to Grindelwald, is a series of intermediate areas. Among them are Mannlichen, Tschuggen and Gummi. They are connected by chairlifts and T-bars, so you can run out one area and ski right onto the lift for the next one.

There is also the run of several miles over to the town of Wengen, and the most direct route is down the Lauberhorn piste, which is one of the most famous World Cup race trails in Europe. Parts are steep, and to imagine skiing it at full speed is to glimpse the brutality of ski racing. But, again, an intermediate skier setting a cautious pace, traversing where Klammer would schuss, can handle the whole run and have the pleasure of lunch and a stroll around Wengen, a carless, comfortable hamlet.

"Beginner Europeans need easy slopes, too. You'll find them, often close to those intimidating peaks—as at Arosa."

Grindelwald also offers a newer, less expansive area, called First, closer to town, perhaps a bit steeper—a bit better for serious intermediate practice.

But my choice of Intermediate Heaven is Davos. A vast area with five separate mountains, it offers all levels of skiers a wondrous choice. It was there, only five years ago, that I first skied the Alps. And it was there, almost by chance, that I first tasted real Alpine skiing.

Starting with great caution, I had picked some of the areas marked "easy," carefully feeling my way over a real Alp. I had discovered the Parsennhutte run, as broad and open as an airfield, gently rolling, and yet right up there on top. It was officially designated "easy," but all around me, everywhere I looked, peaks of mountains poked up through cloud clumps. I was sliding over the roof of the world.

Then, an American I met on a lift and started skiing with asked me if I wanted to make the run over to Klosters with him. At first, I made excuses. It is a run of 11 miles and I wasn't sure I was up to it. In the back of my mind, I had that trip planned for my last day. He assured me I could handle it. "Couple of steep parts," he said, "we'll take 'em slow." I think what I really feared was skiing so far across an unknown stretch of THE ALPS.

We did it. We took two hours and we did it. And I don't think I've known a greater flush of pride in skiing, ever.

That was five years ago, a time when my wife was skiing for the first time. She thought the soreness and the bruises, the lack of progress in the beginning, would defeat her. Yet, she dreamed of our skiing together. She had savored the nonskiing joys of the Alps. Those we could share. It would be something almost spiritual, she said, if we could also share the mountains. So she kept trying, kept in those Swiss ski school classes, and last spring, for the first time, she got the feel. The awkwardness was shed. She was making stem christies without a second thought.

This winter we are returning to Davos. And I have promised Bridget that before our week is out, we will ski from the Weissfluhoch, down the Parsenn run, across the top of the world, and right into Klosters, together.

lack Education: How Good?

By EDWARD B. FISKE

THIS AGE of declining College ard scores and wholesale cutcks in school spending, conrns about quality have come to te education in this country at ls. For blacks, such concerns are raised in especially dramatic Washington, the valedictorian of ior class at Western High School, lominantly black school, was down by George Washington University because he lacked the most rudimentary academic skills. The superintendent was quoted as explaining that, with discipline a major problem in the schools, "a nice kid might have his grades inflated."

A special report on the quality of black education begins on Page 15.

¶Last spring Bernard D. Davis, a professor at the Harvard Medical School, stirred up a major academic controversy by charging that medical schools, including his own, were suspending normal academic standards in order to enroll and graduate minority-group students. Though vigorously denied by officials, the accusations have had a chilling effect on black medical students everywhere.

¶For more than a year seven black and Hispanic parents in New York City have been defying the Board of Education by keeping their 11 children out of school and giving them private instruction. "I don't want to risk putting her back into the public school system," said Collette Winkfield regarding her 11-year-old daughter. "I have seen inner-city youngsters take a lot of enthusiasm and basic brightness into the first grade only to have it lost by the third grade."

Such incidents raise the issue of whether, more than two decades after the United States Supreme Court forced the country in its desegregation decisions to confront the quality of black education, there has been significant improvement in the quality of education of American blacks?

The answer is obviously complex and controversial and depends on how one interprets ambiguous and sometimes conflicting data on subjects such as test scores, desegregation and the effects of compensatory education. Some general conclusions, however, are possible.

The most obvious area of gain by blacks—and the only one in which good data are available—is access to higher education. The proportion of college students who are black has doubled since 1964, from 5 percent to nearly 10 percent, and black high school graduates now go on to some form of postsecondary education at a rate approaching that of whites. Gains at the graduate and professional level are smaller but follow the same pattern.

On the other hand, blacks are disproportionately represented in community colleges and the less selective four-year institutions. Their attrition rate is half again as high as that of whites, and the dropout rate in high school is such that, in terms of the percentage of persons in the traditional college-going age range who go on to some form of higher education, blacks have made little progress. "You have

Adults Changing Careers Press the Colleges to Adapt

By CHARLES MANGEL

THEY CALL IT boredom, frustration, anger or, often, just a kind of malaise. They may be 28 or 40 or 55. But they all want to leave the careers they had selected for themselves. Both the prospective career-changer and the school to which he or she turns for help are finding new kinds of problems. For example, colleges may need to adjust hours at which courses are offered or must provide special counseling.

Older students returning to school may anticipate some of their own problems: "Can I adapt to school after all these years away from it?" "Will I have the patience to stick with the program I need until I complete it in four or five or six years?" "Will my family really understand the need for budget reductions caused by my school costs?" "Will they cooperate with the increased demand on my time?"

Richard Neeley of Dallas had begun college immediately after high school. World War II interrupted his college career after one semester. When he returned from the Army five years later, he had a child, shelved college and took a promising job as a salesman with a furniture store.

The store grew into a local chain. Mr. Neeley prospered with it and became a regional sales manager. But 18 years after his Army discharge, at 44 years of age, he could no longer ignore three problems: "I was bored out of my mind by a job that had become rote and mindless." He could move up no higher in a family business, and he heartily disliked his superior, the owner's son who was 12 years younger than Mr. Neeley (and had a master's degree in business administration from Stanford University.)

Mr. Neeley had an idea he might enjoy real estate and began evening study at a local university toward a baccalaureate in business administration.

But the school did not extend itself for him. "The university was making no concessions to evening students," Mr. Neeley said. "I had three evenings free but I could take courses on only two. Evening scheduling was made up so awkwardly that there was nothing I could take on the third night.

"I also wasted a lot of time taking foolish prerequisites before I could move ahead to the subjects that taught me something. One adviser, who was 23 years old, told me the prerequisites were necessary to give students 'time to mature.' I reminded him I was 44."

Finally, Mr. Neeley found himself just three points short of completing the degree work. It had been six years and he was exhausted. He just couldn't endure any more school. Bureaucracy almost did him in.

The school catalogue said credit would be given for "any elective taken and passed in another school." Mr. Neeley suddenly remembered a three-point trigonometry course he had taken in college during that first semester 24 years earlier. He had forgotten to request transfer credit for it when he began evening school.

He went to his adviser. His request for three points of credit was turned down; trigonometry had no relationship to business administration, he was told. Mr. Neeley went to the college dean. No luck. He argued unsuccessfully with both officials that the catalogue said "any elective." He had to protest to the president of the university before he gained his three points and graduated.

These kinds of tangles caused by apathetic schools and administrators still do occur, but they are lessening. Colleges are making accommodations.

Ramapo College, in Mahwah, N.J., has a Saturday college in which a student starting without credits can earn a degree in four years (summer included). The college has

A Course to Lift the Spirits

By LAWRENCE VAN GELDER

AT CORNELL there is a bit of Bacchus in many a baccalaureate. Two credits' worth, in fact, thanks to a course that could leave many a student high above Cayuga's waters.

The name of the course is Introduction to Wines and Spirits, and Bacchus would have given it a happy nod of approval, as have hundreds of juniors and seniors at the Ivy League university in Ithaca, N.Y., who have flocked to enroll since the course was opened five years ago.

Until 1971 the course—begun in 1950—had been restricted to students registered in the School of Hotel Administration. But then Prof. Vance A. Christian persuaded the university administration to approve a separate introductory course for other students.

"For far too long Americans have had a very limited knowledge of fine wines and spirits," Professor Christian said in explaining his action. "At Cornell we put out the leaders of the world, and yet how many major decisions are made in social settings, at a restaurant or a cocktail party? Cornell students, like everyone else, were weak in the social graces, and I thought that was a damn shame."

The administrative sanctioning of school spirits plus a grapevine created by satisfied students have created Professor Christian's biggest problem: excess demand.

This semester, he noted, enrollment stands at 210, and last spring, the crush to sign up was so intense that 100 seniors were barred. Still, 316 student signed up for the course.

Having met such prerequisites as bendable elbow and payment of $5 fo a supply of six-ounce tasting cups, stu dents join a course that meets fo two hours every Wednesday afternoo

And those who enroll, realizing tha there is many a slip twixt cup an lip, expose themselves to the possibili of a grade of unsatisfactory. In orde to support the credit course academ cally, two written multiple-choi examinations, based on lectures and a sociated readings, must be survive A few short papers and a cha indicating which wines go with certa foods are also required.

The first hour of each Wednesd session is devoted to a lecture abo what is to be sampled during the se ond hour. These lectures are usual delivered by an expert other th Professor Christian.

According to Professor Christian, t average class may sample up to 1 different wines, 15 beers and a doz types of distilled spirits. A typi weekly tasting includes about 10 wi from a particular geographical regi The wines are either paid for by Corn or donated by distributors. Profes Christian figures that more th $17,000 worth of wines are consur each semester.

He says he prefers wines that s dents can readily afford and that available in the Ithaca area. Prices a bottle usually range between $2 a $4, although students last spr sampled a Bollinger Brut Spe Cuvée at $9.95 a bottle.

Students are instructed in traditio tasting techniques and terminology, Professor Christian frowns on what calls a "certain snobbism" associ with these rituals and does not emp size them. He likes to begin with N

COLLEGES and UNIVERSITIES

IF YOU'RE NOT SET ON A CITY COLLEGE, AND YOU'RE NOT SURE ABOUT A COUNTRY COLLEGE, MAYBE YOU SHOULD READ ABOUT OUR COLLEGE.

Where you go to college has a lot to do with where a college is.

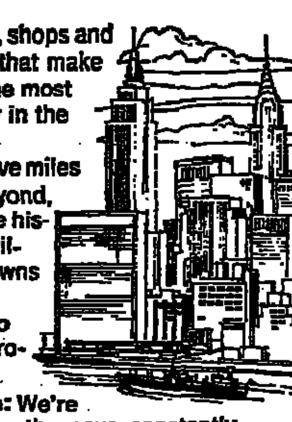
A city college offers all the human and cultural resources of the city it represents. Large, dynamic and diverse, it can enlarge the scope of the student who's ready for it. Or dwarf the student who's not.

A country college offers all the natural beauty and tranquility of the countryside. Small, traditional and personal, it can be a peaceful environment for self-growth. Or a crashing bore.

Our college is Hofstra University. We're neither a city college nor a country college. But because of our location, size, educational wealth and philosophy, we're able to offer the advantages of both environments. Without the disadvantages of either.

Where we are: Hofstra is located in the heart of one of New York's most dynamic suburbs, Long Island's Nassau County.

Nearby are Jones Beach and Fire Island, the Nassau Veteran's Coliseum with its concerts and professional sport events, acres of parks, and beautiful harbors. Twenty-five miles west is Manhattan, the core of the Big Apple. Easily and quickly reached by car or train are all the theaters, museums, art galleries, shops and restaurants that make New York the most exciting city in the world.



Twenty-five miles east and beyond, however, are historic, rural villages and towns that form a scenic link to America's provincial past.

What we are: We're a university on the move, constantly redefining ourselves to meet the needs of a changing world.

Our nearly 4,500 undergraduates represent almost every state in the Union and over 20 foreign countries. With over 1,500 undergraduate courses and 60 concentrations in Hofstra's two liberal arts colleges and its Schools of Business and Education, there's enough depth and diversity to satisfy any student's needs.

At Hofstra, there is the flexibility and encouragement to use every available resource to shape your values, interests and talents. Moreover, an extensive staff of professionals, devoted to counseling and advisement, is available to you at all times.

How we are: The best description is probably the simplest: Free and easy. Faculty and students mingle in the quadrangles, the Student Center, or before and after classes. And on-campus activities are virtually limitless: From plays and concerts to athletic events and guest lectures.

When you consider all the scenic and cultural wealth off campus, it's easy to see that at Hofstra, a student can enjoy and benefit from the best of all possible worlds.

What we'd like you to do: Send for our free booklet, "The Uses of a College Education". It describes where, what and how we are in far greater detail than is possible in this ad.

It will also tell you how to arrange for a visit and a student-guided tour of the campus, and how to apply for scholarships and other financial aid.

"MANHATTAN COLLEGE?" "OH YES, GOOD SCHOOL!"

That's nice to hear. People have been saying that about us for years, and of course, we're grateful. But there is really more to tell about Manhattan College, and such a simple statement, however complimentary, is incomplete.

Manhattan College is a lot more than a "good school".

Manhattan College is a great preparation: For your profession as well as your life. Since 1853, Manhattan College has fashioned every academic program around the needs of the undergraduate. Now grown to include the diversity of five schools – Arts and Sciences, Engineering, Business, Teacher Preparation and General Studies – the education of the undergraduate is still the focal point.

Some 35 majors are offered, ranging from the traditional to the innovative: programs in accounting, English, marketing and languages, for example, as well as unique interdisciplinary offerings in environmental engineering, urban affairs and peace studies. Manhattan College also offers top-rated, pre-professional programs in medicine, law, and dentistry. All of these programs have proven their excellence through the success of their graduates.

Manhattan College is great people: Your fellow students, a highly regarded faculty - many with national and international reputations in their fields, and an experienced, well-trained staff, add up to a friendly, small-college atmosphere in this day of large, impersonal multi-versities. But then Manhattan College has always been a friendly place - its 23,000 alumni, for example, have long been considered among the most loyal and generous in the nation.

Manhattan College is a great place: Located in suburban Riverdale, minutes away from both the city and the country, accessible from every part of the metropolitan area. Manhattan College's 47-acre campus includes high rise apartments, cottages, tennis courts and lots of trees. It's often described as the "downstate college with the upstate atmosphere".

Manhattan College is a great experience: An outstanding education should include co- and extra-curricular activities as well. Manhattan College has a wide range of honor societies and fraternities (Phi Beta Kappa, Sigma Xi), intramural and intercollegiate athletics, and student organizations and groups.

So when people reply "Oh yes, good school" at the mention of our name, they really are saying a lot of things. They are recognizing sustained excellence in higher education for some 124 years. Most importantly, they are acknowledging our concern for quality in higher education. And that is a reputation for which we are most proud.

As the world now knows, Bennington has a defiant tradition of open governance, and I was required to defend my decisions, some of them far from popular, before the entire faculty. Meetings were held in a hall shaped like a Roman arena. I stood in a sort of pit while the faculty above—individually friendly to me but collectively still prickly from the previous term's tensions—questioned my decisions for hours on end. During these inquisitions, which called upon all advocacy skills I had ever learned, I was often tempted to relieve my aching feet by sitting down. I would fantasize that all my tormentors suddenly turned their thumbs down and brought in lions to martyrize me.

I found uses for techniques I had learned as a lawyer: negotiating with the maintenance employees' union; controlling a nonprofit affiliate that conducted summer programs; disposing of surplus college real estate; servicing a bond issue floated to construct the new arts center.

I also had diplomatic functions: welcoming new students; touring the nation to raise funds from alumni; orating in medieval Latin at a mock academic ceremony; binding up old political wounds by inviting past enemies to the same cocktail party; meeting with presidents of other small colleges on common problems; appearing nightly (and enjoying) student plays and concerts; introducing Betty Ford as speaker at the dedication of the arts center—it had been completed a few hours before Mrs. Ford's arrival.

A flood of paper engulfed me. All incoming mail not addressed to a particular department somehow found its way to the president's desk. Every criticism had to be given a considered answer. Relations had to be maintained with sources of Federal and state funds, foundations and other donors.

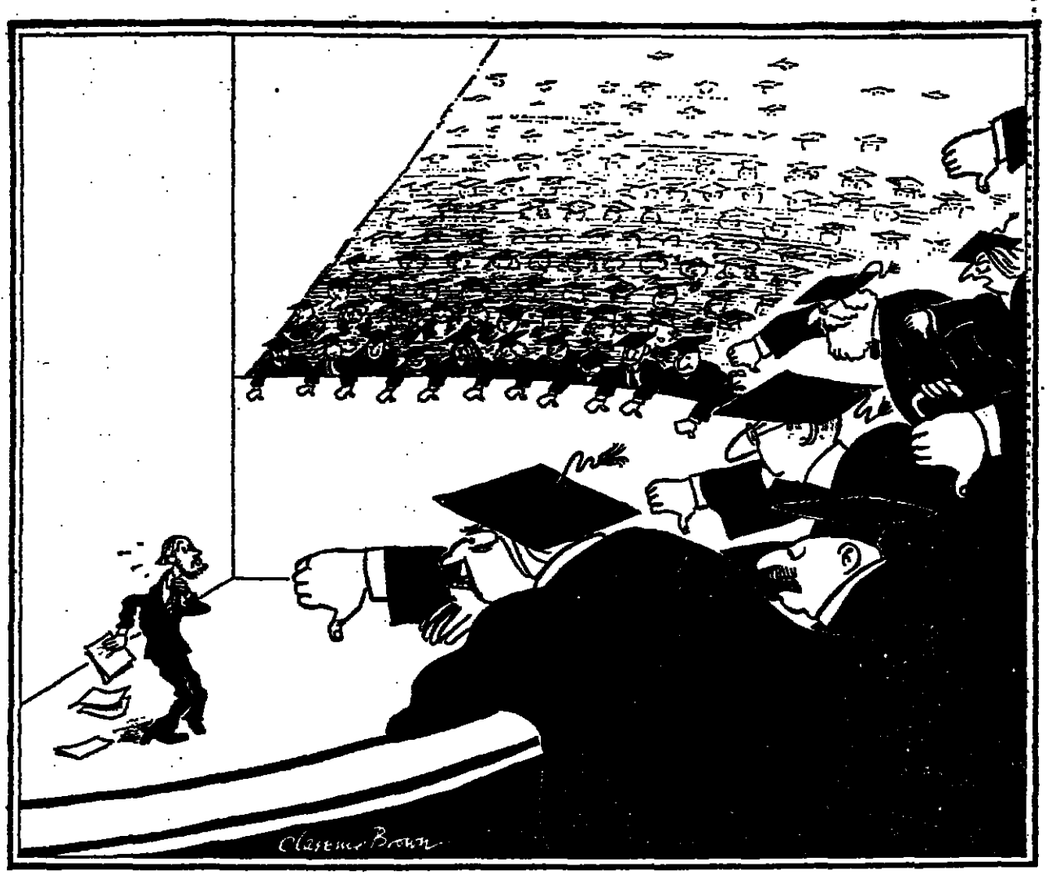
I was interviewed regularly by the local media. Newsletters to the college community had to be composed.

One day I was told that the time had arrived for the 10-year accreditation study of the college. Weeks would have to be spent preparing detailed statements on every facet of Bennington. I heard that the accrediting agency had a new director who had been thrust into his job as suddenly as I had been and was equally over his head in work: I found him receptive to postponing the accreditation study for a year.

The snowy landscape merged into spring mud and then summer greenery, campus politics subsided, classes proceeded, students re-enrolled and Joseph Murphy of Queens College was selected president and would succeed me in the fall. I began to feel less like the little Dutch boy.

The senior class asked me to be its commencement speaker, and the college year ended as I handed them their diplomas. I felt strong kinship with the seniors. We were graduating from Bennington together.

In early July, as my wife and I drove away from the administration building to return to New York, the staff lined up, each holding a large letter. Together they spelled: "Thank you and Godspeed." My term was over.



When the School Gets in the Way of Education

By ROBERT F. BUNDY

Five years ago Rosemarie and I decided school was getting in the way of our son's education. Rob was 11 and attending Jamesville-DeWitt Middle School in DeWitt, N.Y. The school had a fine academic reputation and Rob was doing quite well there. But we felt that he was spending too much time being a student and not enough time being a useful human being in the community. There were other important ways and things to learn besides what school offered, we thought.

We came up with an alternative educational plan and asked for a meeting with the school. Our plan was for Rob to go to school three days a week. One day would be spent as an apprentice to his uncle, who works in a building trade. And on another day he would perform some social service such as working with retarded children. School support, we felt, would be important.

All this naturally aroused questions from the school.

"Couldn't the nonacademic activities occur on the weekend?"

"No," we replied. "We want our children to understand that helping a retarded child to swim, or doing building repair, are as important as sitting in an algebra class."

"But you're expecting Rob to handle the entire curriculum in three days a week. Suppose he can't?" a teacher asked.

"We would simply drop something out of school so we didn't affect his education in any way."

"Are you really then, teaching negative attitudes toward the school?"

"No," we answered. "That would be a waste of Rob's energy."

"But what about credentials and his social development? Won't you be shortchanging him?"

"Look at it this way," we offered. "Credentials are important but does it matter how he gets them? Rob might be able, through independent study, to pass a math Regents and never attend a math class. Or, he could decide to take equivalency exams for high school and college degrees. People in the future are going to be asked if they can pass some competency exam, not how long they sat in a classroom. As for his social development, he might be seen as different somewhat from his peers. But he enjoys music, sports and other group activities. So, beyond academics, there should be many opportunities for healthy social growth."

We weren't as confident as we sounded. We were laying a new program on a son probably pretty content with things as they were. We were taking responsibility for how he would be educated rather than leaving it to the school or the state. Thus, we were certainly experimenting with his future. Anyway, with fears and misgivings we began in the fall of 1972.

The attitude of the school was and continues to be very supportive. The principal, Lance Baker, said there were probably other parents who felt as we did and the school had better learn how to work with us. The guidance counselor, Jim McGrath, took responsibility to troubleshoot problems and be our primary contact with the school. We met periodically with the faculty to discuss the program. After a few months it virtually ran itself.

Things were not always smooth going, however. Once during the first year we almost quit because the pressures seemed too much for the entire family. Then one day Rob came home and said it was okay; he could handle it. We had many problems too in finding tutoring situations and social agencies that would let Rob work with them. He saw in this experience the little regard society has for children's usefulness.

But our biggest difficulty was finding courage enough to withdraw control so that it would be completely his program. Three years ago we solved this by giving him the options of continuing the program, going to school full time, or leaving school altogether. He chose to spend one more day in school for sports and other activities not readily available elsewhere. From then on the program was his.

Rosemarie and I believe we accomplished most of our goals. Rob, now a senior, is a highly independent person, has insights into other cultures and can organize well his own time and learning. He knows how to make the school serve his needs, can analyze the school system and the people in it, and knows what it means to be needed for his own talents.

What's next for him? We don't know, but he has choices. He has a fine academic record as well as five years' training in a professional trade.

Would we do it again? Very definitely yes. But the program must be individualized for each child. This we are learning from our younger children, Mark, who is 14, and Kathryn, 13.

We designed a new educational program for our children based largely on common sense. We trusted our judgment because we were the closest to our children and had the most concern for them. While the program was quite different in some ways from the typical school experience it fit easily into the conventional school framework.

We didn't propose our program as the only way school should be run; rather it was one of many possible kinds of schooling an enlightened society should encourage.

M.A. in Media Studies A Unique Graduate Program at The New School

What Is It?

The M.A. in Media Studies program at The New School is designed to give students a broad knowledge of the functions and impact of media in modern life. It offers an organized approach to the understanding of human symbols, codes, and modes of communication, emphasizing film, photography, and television, the most prominent media in contemporary culture.

Classes in filmmaking and production techniques are integrated with studies in literature, drama and the fine arts. Participants view, discuss, and analyze a variety of film and television offerings, and make their own slides, photographs, audiotapes, live-action and animated films and videotapes. Each student develops a program geared to his or her individual goals.

In addition to the seminars, lectures, and workshops offered within the program, Media Studies participants can take advantage of many other resources of The New School, including extensive course offerings in filmmaking, photography, and other communications arts. Each semester, the New York Chapter of The National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences sponsors courses at The New School in television crafts, performing, production and management. Many of these courses are open to students in the Media Studies program.

Where Does It Lead?

The aim of the Media Studies program is to produce media generalists. Its broad-based curriculum prepares students for a variety of careers in film, television, advertising, public relations, broadcasting, education, and other fields. For recent college graduates and non-professionals, it provides practical and theoretical training; for people already established in communications, it offers a chance to expand their knowledge of basic problems and techniques.

Is It For You?

People come to the Media Studies program from a wide range of backgrounds. Both liberal arts students and communications specialists benefit from the program's unique blend of theoretical, practical, and technical approaches to the understanding of media.

The program is especially responsive to the needs of teachers, librarians, instructional media specialists, community leaders, and others eager to extend their awareness of the influence of media in our lives, and to develop perceptive responses to that influence.

The Spring Semester begins January 31.

Courses will include:
Foundations of Media Theory; Media and American Culture; Seminar in Media Education; Media and the Creative Process; and workshops in video, sound, photography, and filmmaking.

Manhattanville... the best of both worlds

A private, coeducational, liberal-arts college, Manhattanville is located on a 250-acre, verdant campus in suburban Westchester county just 25 miles north of the rich resources of New York City and just minutes away from the beauty of Long Island Sound and lower Connecticut.

Instead of following traditional distribution requirements, Manhattanville's 900 undergraduates, with the help of faculty advisors, design their own individualized program of study. They select their major from the more than 20 fields of study offered, or they design their own.

Pursuing independent study, apprenticeships, and field work, they assemble their own individual portfolios of academic achievement and personal accomplishment. They learn from a faculty committed to excellence—distinguished scholars who have studied at such outstanding universities as Oxford and the Sorbonne.

Graduating with their Bachelor of Arts, Fine Arts, or Music degree, Manhattanville students go on to become doctors, teachers, lawyers, artists, business executives, psychologists, journalists, government leaders, and musicians. They enter about every profession imaginable.

Back when women's lib was women suffrage, we made a pledge to young women of ability

In the early 1900's we were ahead of our time.
Founded when the right to vote was still denied to women, our commitment from the first was to the higher education of women.
From the beginning we stressed high academic standards, a challenging curriculum and faculty quality—things not necessarily required of a women's college—and built a reputation that we've maintained down through the years.

"No one can take your place at the College of New Rochelle"

In the early 70's we were still ahead of our time.
Ignoring the trend away from single-sex colleges, we held firm in our commitment. Today, as others weigh their gains and losses, we take quiet pride in having kept our identity as a four-year liberal arts college for women. Meanwhile, our mission has been broadened in terms of graduate studies for both men and women, a "second chance" for adults who missed or never had the opportunity for higher education, a baccalaureate program in nursing, and more extensive collaboration with the community we serve. But to the students in our School of Arts and Sciences and all young women with a contribution to make, our promise is as firm today as in the past: "No one can take your place at the College of New Rochelle."

Reading: A Primer for Parents

Americans are becoming increasingly concerned about how—and how well—schools are teaching their children to read.

What constitutes a good reading program, however, is a matter of widespread debate. Educators differ among themselves over the best way to teach reading. Parents are rightly perplexed by these debates—as well as how to interpret their children's performance on standardized tests.

The three articles on this page constitute a parents' guide to reading instruction by GENE I. MAEROFF, an education reporter for The Times. The first is a discussion of what is known about how children learn to read and a description of how reading is taught at various grade levels. The second discusses testing, while the third offers suggestions for parents seeking to help their children develop their reading skills to the fullest.

The ABC's of Learning from K to 8

ng is a complex task, not as easy to measure as the simigures produced in reading tests ndicate. It involves looking at d page and being able not only the sounds of the letters, but derive meaning from the words, s and ideas they convey.

ites of the whole-word, sight think the second mistake is sirable because it shows the an understanding of the senicture and meaning.

But phonics supporters would find it deplorable that a youngster should fail so completely to come near the correct pronunciation of the word.

In any event, a reading program that includes phonics would very likely provide a first-grader with an early introduction to words that start or end with the same consonant to help impress on new readers the sound of the letter in the context of the word.

The letter "s," for instance, and its sound at the beginning of a word might be taught in a list that could include the words "sit," "saw" and "sob."

They may learn through repeated drilling that the silent "e" on the end of a one-syllable word gives a long sound to the first vowel in the word. This would apply to such words as "lone," "cane" and "ripe."

By the end of the year, if they have made normal progress, they can read almost any one-syllable word and many compound or two-syllable words, like batboy or snapshot.

Reading at the second-grade level involves a strong reinforcement of the skills learned in the first grade. The kind of material presented to the youngsters is designed to let them apply skills that they have already learned in the context of longer and more involved stories.

Basal readers have moved away from the antiseptic tales of blond, middle-class children living in the country and are now replete with stories of city life and pictures that include black and brown children.

Supplementary materials have been added to the classroom and there are now entertaining, contemporary stories about athletes, entertainers and other live people to entice young eyes to the pages.

A goal in the second grade is to extend the child's battery of skills so that the youngster grows familiar with prefixes and suffixes, word endings such as "ed," "s" and "ing' and punctuation marks.

Rhyming is used to help emphasize sounds and, in some cases, to get pupils thinking about poetry. Sounds formed by consonant clusters such as "bl" in blend and the "st" in "street" become more prevalent.

In the second grade, youngsters are able to write their own sentences and even simple stories of several sentences. They become more comfortable with the dictionary and do rudimentary reference work.

A child should be able to make sense out of what he reads and start drawing conclusions on a fundamental level.

It is this aspect of comprehension, gradually on a more sophisticated basis, that gains in importance in the third grade.

A teacher of 8-year-olds, who are already in their third year of formal reading instruction, can see the gaps in achievement becoming more and more pronounced among pupils. Some pupils are still struggling with sounding out short words, while others are able to read and make sense out of such books as "Little Women" and "Tom Sawyer."

The parts of speech, especially verbs, adverbs and adjectives, take on more importance to third-graders and they expand their knowledge of such vowel combinations as the "ei" in "eight" and "neighbor" and the "au" in "naughty" and "author."

Closer attention is paid to syllables as a way to improve spelling, as well as reading, and students are taught to be careful, for example, in differentiating between "diner" and "dinner" or "scared" and "scarred."

In fact, any good reading program is a part of a total approach to language, therefore producing the term "language arts" to describe an integrated program in which reading instruction complements and overlaps the teaching of spelling, grammar, writing, speaking and listening.

By the fourth grade, most children should have probably been introduced to all of the basic word-attack skills. They should also have had a grounding in semantics and syntax that will help them figure out the meaning of unfamiliar words from the context in which they are used and their relative position in a sentence.

Understanding that there is a logical order to the sequence of events that occur in a story becomes more important as youngsters read more complicated works.

A fourth-grader can start synthesizing, drawing out the main details from a piece of writing and creating his own synopsis in a sensible and orderly fashion.

The basal reader is used less and less as the children get older and in some classes is used hardly at all, with teachers depending on other kinds of material that is more versatile.

Packaged reading programs in kits and boxes, instead of books, more readily lend themselves to the teaching of specific skills on an individualized basis.

Fifth- and sixth-graders complete the basic instruction in the tasks required in reading. The emphasis is on making sure they understand not only the literal dimension of what they read, but also the inferential dimension.

Students are supposed to be able to read by the time they reach seventh grade. Reading is seldom taught as a separate subject at the secondary level.

However, there is growing interest in offering remedial reading to youngsters who failed to get an adequate grounding in the fundamentals.

High school, after all, is the last chance at formal reading instruction for almost all youngsters and once they leave, with or without a diploma, the rest of their lives will be shaped by the extent to which they have mastered the art of reading.

How to Tell What Tests Really Show

Educators rely heavily on tests to tell them how well students are doing in reading. The usual method is by a standardized test that has been administered to a representative sampling of students in the same grade throughout the United States.

The score that an individual achieves on the test is "norm-referenced," meaning that it is determined by comparing the number of right and wrong answers with the results attained by the students in the national group that was sampled.

Multiple-choice questions are used on a standardized test, which usually has sections dealing with various skills involved in reading.

The overall score is actually an average of the scores the student gets on subsections covering such areas as vocabulary, literal comprehension and inferential comprehension.

There are at least three ways of reporting a score on a standardized test.

If, for instance, a fifth-grader took the examination in April, the eighth month of the school term, the grade equivalent score would be 5.8. A score of 5.4 would put that student four months behind grade level.

The score could also be expressed by percentile ranking and if his number of correct answers gave him a percentile rank of 44 it would mean that his performance was at least equal to or better than that of 44 percent of the nation's fifth graders.

A third way to relate a score is by placing it on a continuum or curve, called a standard score, and spreading the results so that a previously determined percentage of the students fall at various points along the continuum.

Reading tests provide a general idea of how a student is doing, but they are not precise. The difference of just a few right or wrong answers could change a youngster's grade-level ranking.

There are many controversies surrounding the use of standardized testing, though supporters maintain that the examinations yield useful information.

They say the results help in assessing a pupil's progress and in planning programs that take pupils' strengths and weaknesses into consideration.

Opponents assert that such tests are biased in favor of children of middle-class upbringing and subject those who do not do as well to destructive comparisons with their peers.

Many critics of standardized tests say they would prefer to see the schools relying more heavily on "criterion-referenced" tests that measure a student's ability to perform specified tasks.

On a criterion-referenced test, experts identify the specific skills that a student should have at a particular grade level and the test is used to determine whether those skills have been mastered.

For instance, if it were decided that the average fifth-grader ought to be able to read and understand a certain passage in Mark Twain's "Huckleberry Finn," this might be one of the tasks on the test.

Look at the various sections, not at the overall score

A parent confronted by a child's score on a standardized reading test should try to find out what the score represents, and how, specifically, the student did on various sections of the test. Most tests are divided into parts that pinpoint specific skills—vocabulary, for example, or inferential comprehension.

One of the problems students seem to have as they grow older is getting inferential meaning out of what they read. A student may be able to read the words and understand them but may have trouble drawing conclusions from what he or she reads and is therefore not arriving at the deeper meaning that is essential to incisive thinking.

Though an overall score may look good, it may have been bolstered by a high performance in other skills, hiding a lack of sufficient achievement on the inferential portion of the test.

Parents should also be familiar with testing done for diagnostic purposes that is to find out what a pupil's learning needs may be. Such tests are valuable in setting up individualized programs and are not related to grade norms.

Such a test may, for example, include a portion to determine whether a youngster understands what must be done to a word when adding an "ing" ending. If the test indicates the student has difficulty with suffixes, a set of exercises will be prescribed to build up his knowledge in the area.

Kept in proper perspective, all tests—standardized, criterion-reference diagnostic—give a rough idea of what taxpayers are getting for the more than $70 billion they spend annually on the country's elementary and secondary public schools, though teachers are chary of looking at tests this way.

One thing a parent must bear in mind in examining a child's score is what the youngster has accomplished in the past.

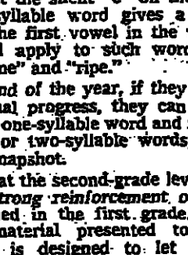
A student who has been making less than a year's progress for each year in school is performing favorably when he makes almost a year for a year even if his average is still below-grade level.

What should count most to a parent is not how an entire school or class is doing in learning to read, but how one's own youngster is doing. Only individual scores will provide this information.

How You Can Make School Easier for Your Child

Is there anything a parent can do to help a child learn to read? The answer is a resounding "Yes!"

Whether they realize it or not, parents play a key role in the learning process simply by living with their children. And the more that parents do to take advantage of the situation, the better off a child will be in reading.



her's contribution begins the moment mes pregnant. Proper nutrition and care can help produce a healthy baby ss likely to start life with an impedilearning.

ought to start reading to children when still toddlers, even before they seem stand what is being read to them. The r get a child comfortable with books. oungster explores his home he should books and magazines are part of the ings.

all else, parents shape the attitudes dren take with them to kindergarten. no assurance that by acting in a certain arent will get a child to think in a d manner, but parents can make it more s will happen.

de is tied closely to motivation. Students y and respect books will probably learn with less of a struggle than those who do not understand the possible rewards from reading. Example is usually a good teacher, so parents who read may find it easier to nurture a reading habit in their children than parents whose children seldom see them reading.

Long before a child enters school he should be given his own books to lea through as he wishes. Many picture books with just a few words on each page are available.

The importance of the preschool years is underscored by the findings of psychologists who believe that a substantial part of a person's personality and thinking patterns are shaped by the age of 6.

xperience of all kinds is bound to aid the new reader. Reading is understanding and the more a child brings to the printed page the more that child will get out of it.

Parents who take their youngsters places, introduce them to people, talk with them, answer their questions and give them intellect-challenging games will be doing their children a service.

Determining how much television a preschool child should be permitted to watch is a challenge that parents must face. Some television, especially a program like "Sesame Street," can promote reading readiness. But there seems to be a point of diminishing returns and only a parent's intuition can be relied on to find that point.

One practice parents should encourage as soon as a child acquires the first trace of reading ability is to let the youngster read aloud to them. And the parent should not cut the child off at a crucial juncture of the story simply because the parent is bored or has no more time available. The child should be allowed to close the book at an appropriate spot, much as an adult would do.

The library is an important place for the new reader. Regular trips should be scheduled and a child should be guided in selecting books of an appropriate level.

Content dictates choice. Just because a parent is interested in a subject is no reason for the offspring to be fascinated by it. Youngsters should be able to choose books that appeal to them.

After all, reading is not an end in itself. People read for a purpose and a child who wants a certain book because of the merriment or information it promises will probably have a stronger urge to read than a youngster who is told to read because reading is good for him.

Parents might look into the possibility of buying a child a subscription to his own magazine, something he can look forward to receiving each month. There are several major children's periodicals and they should be examined to see which suits the child best.

An interesting family activity might be a discussion by parents and children of the books they read together. Parents can also read short passages from their books, magazines and newspapers to children and explain their meaning.

iving a child his own place to read and his own library shelf might also help. And so could an old typewriter.

As children reach the upper elementary grades and secondary school their reading habits and their attitude toward reading will tend to solidify and parents may find it difficult to redirect a youngster who has gotten off to a bad start.

Just because a child is enrolled in school is no reason to stop reading to him or her. Carl Smith, a reading authority at Indiana University, says that until their children reach at least third grade, parents should invite them to curl up on their laps and read aloud to them.

If there is an obvious reading problem, the parent should check with the school to see that the student gets help. Parents of children with reading troubles should be sympathetic and encouraging. One way to get a youngster to read material that he would otherwise consider childish, for instance, might be to convince the child to read to a younger one.

All in all, parents should try to keep track of their children's reading progress and not hesitate about checking with teachers if there are problem areas.

Once a student has completed his formal schooling the cause may be lost.

Queensborough Community College before transferring to Queens College last year. On campus, he was active in the fight against the budget cuts. Now he is attending classes at Emerson College and Boston University.

"The City University is falling apart," he said last week.

But others intend to stay, or at least hope to. For them, the City University, with all its problems, is still an open door to opportunity.

Anna Jackson is studying to be a community mental health assistant at the Borough of Manhattan Community College and wants to go later to a senior college. Her tuition is covered by the state's Tuition Assistance Program, and she takes classes during the day and in the evenings. She also works part-time in a college office.

"I'm a worrier," she said, "and sometimes I think how can I do it, how can I pay all my bills. But I mean to take one semester at a time now. I'm an older student who appreciates how fantastic learning is. I wouldn't be here if I didn't really want to be in school."

"The present is overshadowed by a pervasive threat of doom," Dr. Polishook said. And Chancellor Kibbee, asserting that the university's financial emergency was not over, recently told the City Club of New York: "We are threatened with further deterioration."

Their concern is rooted in the announcement made last spring by the Beame administration that it intends to cut off all financial support to the university's senior colleges at the end of 1976-77. The city, which now pays half that cost (the state pays the other half), wants the state to pick up the full amount.

But the state, which has financial problems of its own, responded by establishing a blue-ribbon commission to study the future of all higher education in the state, and particularly the City University.

The commission's report is not due until March and its release then is certain to stir a lengthy debate. In the meantime, the students and faculty of City University face an anxious and uncertain period.

me when I was with a gang that was taking the heads off of parking meters," he said, "but I got off because that was my first offense. I don't worry about it," he added, "because there's not going to be any second offense. I'm not looking for trouble."

Nor are Jerry, who is 16, Thomas, 17, and Ben, 18, who hang out in the same Brooklyn neighborhood. The four fit no stereotype; two are Caucasian, one Hispanic, one black. Of the four, only one had been approached—once, by an attendance teacher — during more than two years out of school. The families of the other three boys had received neither postcard nor phone call, although Board of Education bylaws require that a parent be notified after the first day of an unexplained absence and that a student be reported to the Bureau of Attendance following an absence of five school days.

New York State law mandates compulsory school attendance for those 6 to 17 years old, but more than 200,000 of the city's 1.1 million pupils are not in school daily. Officials estimate that 80,000 are absent for illness and another 50,000 slip away each day after home-room attendance is taken.

Many of the rest, like Dune 1, are unaccounted for, a legion of dropouts who just stopped going to classes and never bothered to say goodbye.

"Money was tight," said Susanna Doyle of the Queens Lay Advocate Center, an aggressive citizens' group dedicated to the protection of every student's right to an education. "High schools were being allocated funds according to the total register, although many pupils attended class sporadically. So the high school division created the category of long-term absentee, defined as any youngster absent from school for 20 consecutive school days. This was the first official acknowledgment of the existence of this part of the school population. These are your ghosts."

Had this amorphous population been defined so that the children could be located and returned to the school community, the category might have made some sense in human terms, but the long-term absentees were effectively excluded by definition. Their number was subtracted from the total registration of a school to arrive at an adjusted register. Money for the school year is allocated to each school on the basis of the adjusted figures, which are audited in October.

"After October," Mrs. Doyle said, "there's no fiscal incentive for the schools to go out and get the kids. They don't even want them. There'll be no money for them. There won't be enough teachers. They'll crowd classrooms that already are overpopulated."

Spokesmen for the Board of Education say that many children who are unaccounted for ("the no-shows," according to one administrator) have relocated "down South" or "gone back to the Islands," where, it is presumed, they are attending school. Dune 1, Jerry, Thomas and Ben sometimes play in the yard of the school they should be attending.

Why are so many children on the outside? Some do belong to mobile families and thus are easily lost. Not infrequently, in non-English-speaking families, a child, often the oldest girl, is kept at home to serve as interpreter for her parents. Some children are responsible for care of younger siblings. In several neighborhoods of the city, security cutbacks have made parents afraid to send their children to the public schools.

> 'I asked the teacher for help. She told me to sit down and be quiet'

Peer pressure plays a large part in luring children from their classrooms. Once youngsters are out for any lengthy period, however, they are less likely to return. Summer vacations are followed, each year, by a significant increase in the numbers of dropouts.

Children are also being asked to leave school in increasing numbers. Over a five-year period, 1970-75, suspensions rose 67 percent.

Like so many students, Jerry was out of his junior high classroom for a time. When he returned, he was behind in his work. "I asked the teacher for help so that I could catch up," he said. "She told me to sit down and be quiet." For a while, Jerry struggled along. Then he started spending less time at school, more hours in the streets.

Nevertheless, he was promoted to high school under a Board of Education practice that holds that a child may not be retained in a grade for more than one full year during his school career and that, having reached a given age, he must be moved ahead to the next grade.

Theoretically, remedial and guidance supports should be offered to the children who perform below grade. In reality, the greatest number of children out of school are lost in the transition between junior high school and high school. Children wo are afraid of being moved up simply move out.

Jerry was found by Bell Schroeder, director of the Student Information and Advocacy Center in Brooklyn. Last summer, Mr. Schroeder and Miss Doyle set out to prove that the ghosts are real youngsters who can be located.

"We knocked on doors," recalled Mrs. Doyle, "and we rang bells, and we found kids and sisters and brothers and parents. Within a short period, we found 106 children who should have been in school."

The school population has changed, Miss Doyle said, and the system has not. Teachers are still operating as though they had a white middle class student body to deal with. When they fail, the system lays the blame on the kids. That's called the child deficit model. But the deficiency lies within the system.

"They told me I had a good head," recalled Ben, the only one of the four boys who has no intention of going back to school, "and then they pushed me in directions I didn't want to go. Nobody listened to what I wanted." Ben has a factory job. Evenings, he drives a truck. He doesn't think school is important to his future. He's working.

Rudolph M. Callendar, director of the Bureau of Attendance, believes that the vocational schools, formerly viewed as dumping grounds for misfits, are now doing a good job of meeting the needs of today's school population, which is clearly a minority population. They have the best attendance records in the city. There should be more such programs, he believes.

In the meantime, Mr. Callendar said, children must be returned to the schools that are required to take them. The longer they remain out, the more nonattendance becomes a habit. The greater community must recognize that children out of school are everybody's responsibility.

Mr. Callendar is a dedicated and a clearly frustrated administrator. Budget cuts have drastically reduced the number of attendance teachers at a time when there is more need for them than ever before. "There are no ghosts," Mr. Callendar declares. "Given time and personnel, I am convinced I can find every child out there."

The Trick Is Matching A Nursery To a Child

By ELLEN RODMAN

About 2 million children of preschool age are going to American nursery schools this year. Because nursery-school education is optional and outside the public school system parents must decide where, if anywhere, a child will go. The choices are numerous, varied and confusing, and the selection process may take months.

One way to begin the search for the right nursery school is to weed out possibilities. Certain handicapped or learning disabled children, for instance, will require special schools. Some families know immediately that a combination of nursery education and religious instruction is not for them. Others know that it will be too difficult to meet the demands that a cooperative nursery school may impose. And, of course, the cost factor might preclude a particular nursery school from fitting into a family's budget.

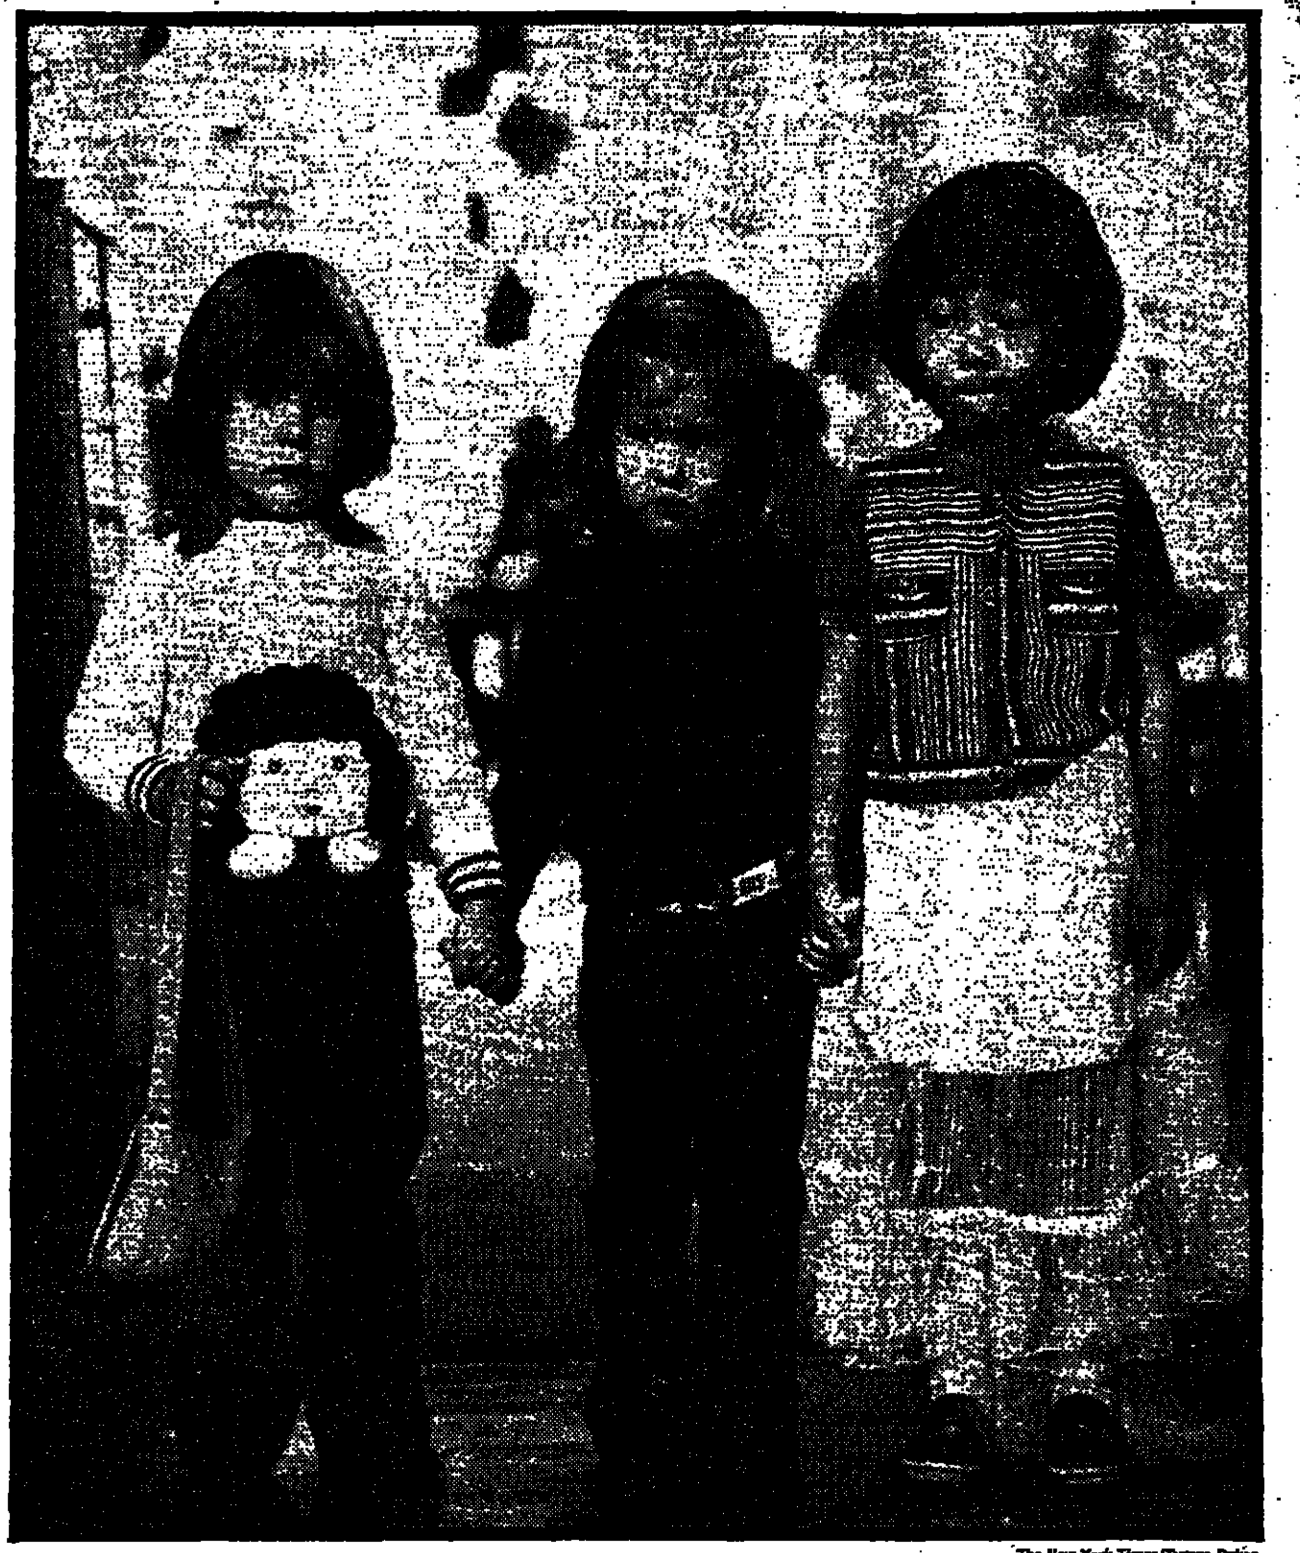
According to the New York City Department of Health, Division of Day Care, the licensing agency for services, including nursery schools, for youngsters under 6 years old, the cost of 5-day-a-week, 9- or 10-month-a-year private nursery schools that do not get government funding can run as high as $2,300 annually for a full day (9 A.M. to 4 P.M.) and $1,700 for a half day (either 9 A.M. to noon or 1 P.M. to 4 P.M.). The least expensive, division officials say, charge about $1,400 for a full day and $500 for a half day.

Cost is determined by several factors. One of the factors is the number of days of attendance per week. And if transportation is included, the tuition may be higher. The school's geographical location, fund-raising ability, and it's rental obligation—which may vary according to location and affiliation—also contribute to costs.

Churches, synagogues, hospitals, private elementary schools and "Y's" may provide space for nursery-school programs at nominal rentals and occasionally rent free. Successful fund-raising may guarantee the availability of scholarships on a scale adjusted to a family's ability to pay.

Some schools not organized on a cooperative basis may make trade-offs with parents—that is, reduced or free tuition for a parent who provides a service like transportation or music lessons. Then, too, the extent of parent involvement in cooperative schools affects the cost. The more duties that parents assume, the lower the cost; the greater the dependency on outside services, the higher the cost.

What does a parent do when several brochures claim that the particular schools they describe have conscientious dedicated staffs, well-planned up-to-date curriculums, classroom atmospheres conducive to learning, good child-teacher ratios, personalized instruction and administrators interested in and responsive to the needs of the pupils?



The New York Times/Tyrone Dukes

Dr. Burton White, senior research associate at the Harvard School of Education and author of "The First Three Years of Life," advises parents to visit several schools and then to ask themselves if they like the supervisor and staff.

Do those in charge appear to like children or are they hypocritical and condescending? Do they display common sense, patience, and humor? Do they have engaging personalities? "In other words, are they people you would like to have substituting for you?" Dr. White said.

Dr. Patrick C. Lee, associate professor of education in early childhood education at Columbia Teachers' College, and Priscilla Pemberton, director of non-matriculated students and instructor in curriculum for preschool and kindergarten programs at the Bank Street College of Education, echoed Dr. White's recommendation.

The experts then suggest posing practical questions. Ask whether there is a choice of half-day or whole-day programs and if snacks and/or lunch is available. Consider, too, how far the school is from home, if transportation is available and at what price, and how long the child will have to travel.

Dr. Lee believes that there are advantages to a school near home. The child gains a sense of neighborhood because he sees the same children in school. "A nearby school, rather than being an alien child preserve, broadens while integrating the child's familial and academic worlds," he said.

Mrs. Pemberton urges parents to read books on the subject of nursery schools, to talk with other parents and teachers and to think long and hard before making a final commitment.

Dr. Lee said: "Don't let a school administrator pressure you into saying 'yes' on the spot. After all, the nursery school is the first societal connection outside the family, and the decision as to which nursery school is right should be made by the whole family after comparing and reflecting. Remember that the school is part of a child-care team includes the family."

As far as possible, parents should investigate the staff's backgrounds, preparation, and prior experience. Determine how extensive is the staff's knowledge and understanding of theories about child development and the learning process.

But Dr. White warns parents to avoid schools that claim to be "educationally powerful." He explains:

"If a school makes claim to that, it doesn't know what it's talking about. A certain educational method might provide entertainment, socializing or short-term learning impact, but none of the so-called revolutionary teaching techniques has demonstrated that it can provide anything educationally significant to a child from a good home."

He even suggests that a parent might decide that the child is better off in a local play group or just at home with family doing what comes naturally.

Mrs. Pemberton, who defines an acceptable learning environment as a clean, safe, colorful, and pleasurable space with adequate supplies and materials warned: "If stuff tumbles out of the closets, you might assume that beyond the glitter there's just a trap," she said.

The New York Times/Tyrone Dukes

You might want to take a look at some of the materials. Do the books project stereotyped role-models? Do the teachers give the children a sense of options, or do they tend to encourage children to act according to gender? May boys play in the doll-and-kitchen corner and girls with the tools?

Perhaps the most crucial responsibility a parent encounters is that of matching a nursery school to the child. That may be more difficult than determining whether or not a school is a good one.

Dr. Lee suggests that parents analyze the child's temperment, habits and emotions, starting with how the child slept and ate as an infant. He emphasized that a child's individual characteristics are not character defects but simply personality traits that should be taken into account when selecting a nursery school.

According to Dr. Lee, if the director—who sets the tone—talks mostly about the school, its history and traditions, chances are that place is not going to be flexible to children's differing qualities.

If a child withdraws from instead of approaching new situations easily, his or her parents need a school that allows them to stay with the child as long as is necessary for the child's adjustment.

Some children are persistent, others yielding. Still other have irregular or regular habits. Know whether your child has emotional extremes or reacts mildly to new situations.

An irregular but insistent child, according to Dr. Lee, needs a flexible school that will not frustrate. She or he should get orange juice when he's thirsty, not at 10 A.M. exactly. High activity children need space and latitude in which to move and a lot of innovation and variety in the program. Other children thrive in very structured situations and find comfort in knowing that they have juice at 10 A.M. and painting at 11.

"Parents should not use schools to restructure their child's built-in life rhythmics," Dr. Lee said.

The fact that children differ means that when a parent has succeeded in selecting the right nursery for the first child, the search will have to begin all over again for a younger brother or sister.

Ellen Rodman, who writes on children and parents, collaborated with Richard Flaste of The Times on "The New York Times Guide to Children's Entertainment," to be published soon by Quadrangle.

Truth in Advertising Takes on Colleges

By EVAN JENKINS

Under pressure from students, parents, the courts and especially the Federal Government, colleges and universities are being forced to tell prospective applicants much more about themselves—including their shortcomings—than ever before. There is at least a suspicion that some schools may not survive the telling.

The growth of the movement has coincided with the increasing competition among colleges for students and among graduates for jobs.

It has produced a rising flood of complaints, many leading to embarrassing lawsuits, in a host of areas—quality of instruction, grading, academic standards, costs and financial aid, career counseling and job placement, even dormitory crowding. And it led last month to passage of a tough new Federal law.

Also last month, and not coincidentally, Barat College in Lake Forest, Ill., a school for women with a full-time enrollment of about 500, brought out a new publication designed to tell potential students about the college. Among other things, it tells them this:

"Studio art, theater and dance, and a few other areas are outstanding enough to be a basis alone for choosing Barat. An exceptionally talented student musician or mathematician, on the other hand, might be advised to look further for a college with top faculty, students and facilities in that field."

A college volunteering information about its shortcomings? Indeed, and there's more in the same vein—along with much that is positive—in the Barat "prospectus."

A cooperative program with Lake Forest College, for example, is presented as a definite plus, but the publication provides caveats: Conflicting academic calendars often make cross-registration difficult, and the campuses are a mile apart, which means bus connections "can be a hassle." In earlier Barat publications, the program was just promoted—no caveats.

The Barat (pronounced BAA-ruh) prospectus and a similar document developed by the University of California at Irvine, which has about 9,500 students, are startling for their candor and for the amount of hard data they contain. And while they reflect the genuine concern many educators have about giving students adequate information, they also reflect the keen interest of the Federal Government.

The two publications are the first fruits of a two-year effort by the National Task Force on Better Information for Student Choice, a federally funded project involving 11 postsecondary schools and four education organizations. Its purpose is to determine the information needs of students and develop models for giving the information more accurately.

There is wide agreement among educators and critics of the educational establishment that colleges and universities have simply not given students enough information to go on. Now it seems clear that they have no choice but to do a better job. As Charles B. Saunders, director of governmental relations for the American Council on Education, put it in an interview:

"By and large, although they've usually acted in good faith, the institutions have done a pretty lousy job of providing information to students. Self-regulation is hard, but it's the only defense we have against unwarranted Federal intrusion."

The council last month sent its nearly 1,400 member colleges and universities a book it called "New Expectations For Fair Practice." Noting increased government pressures for reform as well as "broad allegations that the legitimate rights of students are ignored," it urged schools to review and improve procedures in such areas as official publications, financial-aid information, record-keeping and career counseling.

'Improving' Law School Aptitude Is Big Business

By LINDA K. NATHAN

When John Sexton enters the classroom of his Law School Aptitude Test (LSAT) Preparation Center, his assistant stands waiting with a steaming mug of coffee. "The one provision under which I teach is coffee every half hour. I drink 20 cups a day," he said. "Coffee kills my appetite. Eating takes too much time!"

Time is valuable to the 33-year-old teacher, for not only does he shuttle regularly from Brooklyn to the Harvard Law School in Cambridge, Mass., where he maintains an A average, but he also supervises a thriving business helping people get into law schools.

Mr. Sexton is riding the crest of a major industry—preparing students for standardized tests. Among these standardized tests is the LSAT, required of most candidates for admission to law schools.

The LSAT is administered in colleges and universities five times a year by the Educational Testing Service and the Law School Admissions Council. Graded on a scale of 200 to 800, it is a four-hour multiple-choice examination that claims to test candidates' verbal and mathematical aptitude in addition to such abilities as logic and practical judgment.

Last year 134,724 people, competing for about 40,000 law school openings, took the LSAT. Of these, 20,000 took the exam in the New York metropolitan area. And approximately 6,000 of those candidates took one of the six commercial prep courses for the test given in the area.

Coaching students for the LSAT is a multimillion-dollar a year industry nationwide. It is also a source of growing controversy among both students and educators. Depending upon who is speaking, the prep courses either instill or allay test anxiety; they either increase, or as some have charged, decrease test scores. Furthermore, coaching raises ethical questions: Does it distort the admissions process by giving some applicants an unfair advantage? Should there be coaching at all for a test that is intended to measure aptitude, not achievement?

At Mr. Sexton's centers, a 40-hour course, limited to 20 students, costs $250. A 28-hour course is available for $150; while an intensive weekend 18-hour course costs $95. Added laboratories in areas where students are experiencing difficulty are available at no extra charge. Scholarships are offered to needy students upon presentation of letters from their prelaw advisers attesting to their financial need.

Mr. Sexton combines the lecture method with question-and-answer sessions to "drill in a system that minimizes error." Students are taught to recognize and understand exam-type questions through a range of courses covering reading comprehension, logical reasoning and quantitative analysis.

One of Mr. Sexton's competitors is 25-year-old Albert Slawsky, a lawyer and the director of the Rutgers Review Center. Mr. Slawsky, who is co-author of a forthcoming book on preparing for the LSAT, boasts of having received an 800 score on his own test.

Two lawyers, David Kaufman and Henry Gordon, direct the Evergreen LSAT Review Course in New York, New Jersey and Long Island. They admit that competition is keen among the prep courses but assert that they offer "more and better materials."

Stanley H. Kaplan Educational Center Ltd. is another prep center for the LSAT. Thirty-two hours of class instruction limited to 30 students are available for $250. In addition, students may visit the center seven days a week to listen to roughly 100 supplementary tapes that enlarge on the classroom instruction.

Although each course surveyed noted an increase over the previous year's enrollment, law school admissions officers take a dim view of the prep courses. "I've never seen any evidence that they help," reports Joyce Curll, director of admissions for the New York University School of Law, "but that may be deceptive since people don't report to me when they've done well. But I have been told that they're hurt by instilling anxiety and false confidence. Some students were prepared for questions which ultimately didn't appear on the exam."

A survey of law school admissions officers at Harvard, Stanford, St. John's and Michigan confirmed that the courses were not usually recommended.

The official stance of E.T.S. is that "the LSAT measures intellectual qualities that develop gradually, types of knowledge that are accumulated over a relatively long period of time. Therefore, we feel that no specific preparation can be made immediately before the test."

Millard Ruud, executive director of the Association of American Law Schools, believes that if prep courses do indeed work, the law school admissions process is distorted. He concedes that "if they don't work, they can at least provide psychological comfort. But we don't recommend any of them."

Schools With a Special Delivery

By G. HOWARD POTEET

Correspondence schools have always been treated as unwanted offspring by the educational establishment. The history of home-study instruction is often an unpleasant one: dishonest school owners have sometimes plundered the field, exploiting the naïve. Bogus "colleges" whose only campus is a post office box have frequently satisfied the mania for degrees and diplomas with phony Ph.D.'s.

But 40 million Americans—including Lawrence Welk, Stuart Symington, and Charles Schulz—have taken home-study courses since 1900, and today correspondence courses remain a valid form of education.

In contrast to the educational charlatans that hurt the image of home study, some 70 respected colleges and universities throughout the United States offer correspondence courses for college credit. Getting a real academic degree by mail is not yet commonplace, but three privately owned institutions do offer valid academic degrees: the ICS Center for Degree Studies in Scranton, Pa.; the Grantham School of Engineering in Los Angeles, and La Salle Extension University in Chicago.

In addition, state-supported institutions such as the Regents External Degree Program in New York State and Thomas A. Edison College in New Jersey evaluate work experience and educational credits obtained in a variety of ways and credit them toward a degree.

Most of the four million students now thought to be taking correspondence courses are not seeking college degrees or studying for a new career, even though ads for correspondence schools stress the money-making opportunities that await graduates. Most people take home-study courses for self-improvement or for advancement in their present careers.

These occupational-vocational courses are the heart of correspondence education in about 700 home-study schools—109 of them accredited—with enrollments ranging from fewer than 100 to more than 300,000 students in the Extension Course Institute of the United States Air Force.

Recently, enrollments in correspondence courses have dropped and the number of large home-study schools has dwindled. In 1972, 188 schools were members of the National Home Study Council; the number has now plummeted to 109.

Why? Costs of paper, printing and postage, the three staples of the industry, have soared. Regulation by Federal and state agencies has complicated administration work. Further, people in rural areas, once the most common correspondence students, now have access to rapidly proliferating community colleges.

The typical correspondence school student is now male, 35 years old and a high school graduate earning over $10,000 a year. Most students pay their own tuition, although Veterans Administration funds are sometimes available, or costs are borne by employers. The average cost of a course is $650. The Committee on the Financing of Post-Secondary Education found home study one of the most economical forms of education.

Over 40 percent of the students finish their courses, a better record than that of part-time undergraduates. A typical course is two years, although the range is from a few weeks to more than four years.

What are the advantages of correspondence study? A potential student can enroll at any time or place, study time fits into any work schedule and educational theory is stressed less than practical application to on-the-job situations.

There are also disadvantages. Poor readers may have difficulty with instructions. Students often study in inadequate, makeshift learning environments. While students in a conventional classroom can get questions answered immediately, home-study students must wait. And wait. But the main deterrent to successful home study can be the student's own study habits. Some are unable to organize time productively or lack sufficient self-discipline to complete assignments. Successful correspondence study requires a student who can work on his own. Even then some conscientious students spend a year or more learning what they could get in one semester at a traditional school.

This raises the question: Is there a future for correspondence instruction? Or is the present decline a portent of things to come?

Correspondence education may be reeling, but it cannot be counted out. Educators suggest that home study has met only a temporary setback and that by upgrading courses, by using more innovative instructional techniques—answering student queries by WATS telephone lines, for example—and by developing programs in areas in which there is no competition from traditional schools, home study will continue to attract students.

Home study meets the special needs of prisoners, shut-ins, and people who work shifts that conflict with class hours. It permits esoteric subjects—raising bonsai trees, customizing vans, designing yachts, or cutting gems—to be offered to interested people who could not be gathered together in any other way.

What criteria should prospective students use in searching for a correspondence school? First, the school should be accredited. Accreditation means the school has been evaluated and found to meet certain standards. Some nonaccredited schools may sound good, but you proceed at your own risk in finding out. The accrediting commission of the National Home Study Council, recognized by the United States Office of Education, checks to see if the school advertises truthfully, has a qualified staff, a sound curriculum, and shows evidence of student success.

Check local businesses to see if they will hire graduates of specific home-study schools. A school you choose should offer training recognized by industry.

Compare courses and prices. Look at traditional schools as well as correspondence schools.

Examine the contract carefully. Make sure there is a cancellation clause and provision for a refund—accreditation by the National Home Study Council requires one. If the training is inadequate or if your schedule or interests impinge upon your studies you should be able to recover your investment. Separate the promises of salesmen from the stipulations of the contract. Check the school with your local Better Business Bureau and Chamber of Commerce.

For further information on occupational-vocational correspondence education and a free list of accredited schools, write to the National Home Study Council, 1601 18th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20009.

For information on courses offered by accredited colleges and universities contact the National University Extension Association, Suite 360, One Dupont Circle, Washington, D.C. 20036.

Going to College—One Way to Spend a Weekend

By WILBUR CROSS

John and Laura Tompkins discovered a new and appealing way to spend their leisure time. On one weekend out of every three they became weekend students at Elizabeth Seton College near Yonkers. Laura studied languages. John worked toward an associate in liberal arts degree.

A friend of theirs, Ann MacLeod, was also mixing weekend fun with self-improvement at the College of Mount Saint Vincent, on a spacious, wooded campus along the banks of the Hudson in Riverdale. She was studying communication arts to improve her skills in her job with a radio network. On some weekends she commuted—less than an hour from her midtown apartment. But often she stayed in one of the dormitories for $6 a night to use the tennis courts, swimming pool and other facilities.

Jean and Dave Bartlett prefer more of a vacation atmosphere and the companionship of one or more of their three daughters. For the past four years they have participated in the annual four-day Victorian Holiday at Mohonk Mountain House in New Paltz, N.Y., where they study antiques, architecture and history.

The weekend college, an educational phenomenon of recent vintage, provides flexible opportunities to use leisure time both recreationally and productively. You can live and eat on campus at modest rates, commute, or do both. Some programs cover a subject in a weekend. Others are continuing events, wherein participants attend, say, once a month over a period of six months to a couple of years.

The result may be a new skill or interest, degree credits or a degree—from associate to masters. You can attend alone, with a companion, the whole family, or a group.

The term "weekend college" has also come to mean any short program of continuing education for adults. There are hundreds of centers—many in non-academic settings — where these courses are available—dealing with everything from communications and the creative arts to economics, business, science, sailplaning, violin-making, political science, ecology, folklore, languages and just plain contemplation.

The trend toward weekend education is hitched to a very real educational need. People who are past college age and actively involved with jobs, careers, volunteer work or homemaking, are finding the programs refreshing as well as a direct route to improving job capabilities, switching careers, obtaining raises or promotions, enriching their lives, and meeting people with similar interests and objectives.

In many instances, just the act of participating in a weekend college brings about an abrupt change in a person's life style: getting up early on Saturdays, working late, reading and studying in free time.

The experience is different from the old night-school grind. Generally, enrollment automatically entitles the student to the use of recreational and sports facilities on the campus, as well as student rates to cultural events and exhibitions associated with the college or other institution.

There are more people attending colleges and universities part time than full time in this country, a fact related to the American penchant for self-improvement. Many of these are adults who are going back to the campus to earn the degree they never had the time, motivation or money to get before.

There are so many centers now offering short courses that you should have no trouble finding one that is right for you. Should you commute or live in residence? That depends in part on your interests and adaptability. Bear in mind that living on campus adds an important dimension to education.

Another often-asked question is "How can I qualify?" People who have been out of college 20 or 25 years—or may never have been students at all—frequently yearn to enroll in a course that would be helpful to them, but fail to take any action because they fear they will not meet entrance requirements.

In many cases, there are no such requirements, beyond a desire to learn. Furthermore expertise in a certain fields may entitle a person to enroll in advanced study beyond the reach of undergraduates. Sometimes there are opportunities to meet authorities in the field of your choice—people who are well known in the creative arts, communications, government or other field—since instructors are often brought in from outside academic institutions.

Colleges and universities are not the only institutions offering short residential courses. In the New York metropolitan area there are also programs that are sponsored by museums, churches, institutions, nature organizations and resort hotels.

Local educational groups also sponsor weekend and other short residential programs for adults. The South Orange-Maplewood Adult School in Maplewood, N.J. developed "weekend with ideas" several years ago for adults who were interested in subjects of health, law, religion and the quality of life. The New School for Social Research recently offered a rural family weekend on assertiveness in job and family relationships.

Wilbur Cross is the author of "The Weekend Education Source Book," published by Harper's Magazine Press.

ntegration Problems Now Vex European Schools

By BARBARA CROSSETTE

DON—The bashful Moslem girl tain's gray Northeast, the frail on child on the doorstep of a rial hotel in Paris, the quartet nning Turkish boys shouting to the TV camera, "We are rs"—they are all children of a eneration who are forcing Euro- educators to face for the first ime of the same debates on the tion of ethnic and racial minori- at have preoccupied their Ameri- unterparts for more than two s.

nflux of immigrants from former s—as well as migrant labor oorer countries to do the dirty hat prosperous Northern Euro- don't want to do—has led to controversy in almost every country. Tensions have pro- rioting in Britain and violence Netherlands. There are ghettos pan cities again, but this time bitants are Turks.

e schools, teachers, administra- dents and parents debate the or even the wisdom—of bilin- ching. Parents and community charge that nonwhite children far too often in classes for the tally subnormal. Busing has ed—and largely rejected. Black ople, feeling alienated in what ave been remarkably homo- hite societies, look for an ethnic studies—and often resistance from the schools. ew situation is taxing the in- of local school districts and education ministries. It has volved the European Commis- governing body of the Euro- onomic Community, or Com- rket, in a search for solutions ems without precedents.

lying the problem, in the view , is the inability of European to see themselves as multira-ry to focus on the needs of eth- rities," said Yvonne Collymore, n officer with Britain's Com- Relations Commission. "But reluctance on the part of ms to accept that people are igrants forever. Here, in the f many, there can be no such a black Briton."

Although racially exclu- migration laws now tend to in- urther entry in many countries, s already in Europe are estab- second and third generation mi-lever the status of newcomers, sibility for educating their chil- ils on the host country. How to is a controversial issue. The Eu- Commission, which has studied s affecting migrants, has taken w that while intensive training in the local language must be provided so that adjustment to new schools will be easier, courses in the children's own *language and culture should be contin*ued so that they maintain contact with their countries of origin.

A directive asking that such courses be provided by 1978 in areas of minority concentration was issued by the commission last year. Grants are being provided to hasten the process.

In the Netherlands and in France the European Commission's attempt to promote bicultural education appears to have met with some official enthusiasm.

Methods for teaching migrant and immigrant children in France have been developed by the government-funded Center for Research and Education in the Spreading of French. Teachers are offered special courses in two centers. This year for the first time the French will use a Common Market grant to teach Portuguese and Arabic to some children of foreign families in Paris.

The New York Times/Barbara Crossette

But some parents, feeling their children are being forced to remain outsiders, and school administrators have taken exception to the policy of bicultural education.

Egbert Jancke, who is in charge of the education of foreign children in West Berlin, where they account for 7.7 percent of the school population, explains his dissent this way:

"As I see it, most of the children in the coming school generation are genuine Berliners. Therefore we are going full sail into integration. Otherwise we would be sure to have serious social problems on our hands in a few years' time."

Among foreign families in West Berlin—mostly Greeks, Turks and Yugoslavs—only the Greeks have opposed the system, saying they fear "Germanization" and want their children prepared for a return to life in Greece.

'Here, in the minds of many, there can be no such thing as a black Briton'

In Britain, the official European view is rejected outright. Peter Litton, the Under Secretary of State in the Department of Education and Science responsible for the education of immigrants, said:

"The E.E.C. is talking about migrant labor. We don't get migrant labor here. We get immigrants. We have the power, and indeed we have been using it, to argue against the E.E.C. directive. We have some schools with a dozen or more minority groups. How could we provide them all with the cultural or linguistic education the E.E.C. is asking for? In fact, in one or two of the places where we have tried special courses they have been condemned by the parents themselves. Some say: 'We came to this country because we thought it would be a good place to be. Teach our children English.'"

New and increasingly radical black groups in Europe also reject official plans for bicultural education. But they do not rule out ethnic studies, providing that these are devised by the minority groups themselves.

In Britain, where children of West Indian background getting out of school are facing unemployment at twice the 6 percent national rate, black radicals are looking toward their Afro-Caribbean roots as a way out of social alienation. They are reviving the use of Jamaican Creole, a Caribbean patois, and are working to ally with young Britons of Asian backgrounds who are becoming more radical in the face of widely reported unprovoked attacks on Asian families and homes throughout the country.

Not everyone is in accord. "Black studies? I'm dead against it," said Max Morris, head teacher of a large secondary school in a black area of London. "It was a nonstarter when the old New York Teachers Union tried it decades ago. It's still a nonstarter—and it's wrong. Black studies deliberately foster the racial consciousness of children. That just won't do in British schools."

European nations believe new ghettos and ghetto schools can be eliminated through housing policies that scatter minority-group families in public housing or help them acquire homes in higher-income areas. They do not see forced desegregation of schools as the answer to problems of concentration.

Only the British have attempted busing, which still goes on at Ealing, in West London, despite a suit by Asian parents seeking to stop it because only their children were being bused. Mr. Morris said that any further busing experiments would only bring "rioting in the streets."

In West Berlin, "better" residential neighborhoods have schools with no minority children. But in the downtown areas of Kreuzberg and Wedding—"little Turkeys"—the concentration of minority-group children is high. The Johann Gutenberg School in Kreuzberg has an almost totally foreign student population.

Mr. Jancke explained why West Berlin had rejected busing:

"We have come to the conviction that experiments as they exist in the United States and Britain do not offer a solution to the problem. Reports of these experiments show that the transporting of children from places where their families live to other areas for schooling does not even bring about the fiction of integration. In the United States and England increasingly aggressive attitudes have been observed instead."

In Europe, compensatory education is largely restricted to the provision of special language classes or bicultural experiments. The idea of waiving the rules for minority-group children who have to struggle doubly hard in selective education systems is rarely discussed. Reverse discrimination, quotas or tokenism are not part of a European vocabulary.

The educational attainment of minority-group children in Europe is hard to measure, partly because there are almost no statistics to work with, and partly because they are largely the chil*dren of working-class families.* Such families, whatever their national origin generally have very limited access to selective secondary schools and, through those schools, to higher education.

But some black families have been in Europe long enough to begin to suggest that the educational discrimination their children face may have more to do with race than with class. In Britain new organizations of black parents and students, as well as community groups are prepared to take local education authorities to court on charges of discrimination. A new Race Relations Act will soon be in force to help them.

Educational administrators throughout Europe see the potential for increasing racial and ethnic conflict in schools. Mr. Litton, of the British education department, is concerned about, among other things, the lack of interest black children show in becoming teachers.

"We sense that they are beginning to view teachers—like the police—as the oppressor," he said.

Teachers also worry. Brenda Howarth, who heads the English department of a large London high school, says that many of the attitudes she finds in essays are "dead racist," and that many of the prejudices can be traced directly to the homes of white—not all of them English—children.

Mr. Litton likes to tell the story of *a conference at which a Briton of Po*lish descent was lecturing his minority-group audience on how his family had made it in Britain through hard work and perseverence.

"What makes you different from us?" he asked rhetorically.

From a black West Indian girl came this retort: "You must be blood blind!"

Hope for Corporate 'Bulls' Who Become 'Rabbits' in Public

By STEVEN RATTNER

John Hollingworth, a Union Carbide executive, looks at tapes of his talk with Mark Curran of Communispond. The New York Times/Jack Manning

The Rotarians are just finishing their roast beef when the guest speaker, the general manager of the local shoe factory, the town's largest employer, gets up to speak. He is outraged by Washington's failure to impose import restrictions on foreign competitors and has spent a long day preparing a fiery speech that he expects will propel his audience to instantly write the White House.

But as he scans the vast hall, his outrage turns to fright. He begins to shake. As he talks, he stares down at the lectern and mutters mostly to himself. The audience begins to melt away.

For business executives who want to become better speakers — often to explain themselves to suspicious citizens—there are a growing number of courses available: 45 by one count. These range from the traditional Dale Carnegie approach to new methods based on the most recent technology.

"Our clients are the people who want to know how to put their thoughts together quickly," Ted Fuller, vice president of Communispond Inc., probably the largest of the recent arrivals, said. "The biggest problem is that they're just nervous about talking before a group. They're all anxious to do a good job, but most have never had practical information about public speaking."

For $8,500, two Communispond instructors will travel to a company and offer a two-day course to up to 20 participants. Communispond also offers "public" group sessions to executives for $600 per participant. If a company wants a special program, Communispond will design it for $3,000 to $5,000. If an executive wants private instruction, a Communispond professional is available at $1,500 per day.

The basic course is offered in Communispond's classroom, a rather ordinary Manhattan office laden with floodlights, microphones, cameras and television monitors. A video taping system, which lets executives see for themselves how they slouch or mumble or talk to only part of the audience, forms the heart of the instruction program.

Communispond's two-day program begins with each participant taping a "benchmark" presentation—an unrehearsed, unassisted compendium of all the student's faults. After two days and several more tapings the student will be able to compare the tapes and decide whether the course has been useful.

Techniques for using visual aids, eye contact control, use of the body, organization of speeches and other topics are taught. Sections of the course also deal with using a lectern, handling questions and answers and making impromptu remarks.

An integral part of the Communispond approach is providing two instructors—one to lead the class while the second reviews videotapes with a student in another room.

Dorothy Sarnoff Speech Dynamics and Communications Systems, recently bought by Ogilvy and Mather, the advertising firm, specializes in individual preparation for public appearances. The actor Robert L. Montgomery, offers similar instruction.

The Dale Carnegie organization, which predates the current wave of interest in communications, put about 90,000 people a year through its programs. In addition, a variety of professional associations, such as the American Management Association, offer various forms of public speaking aid to their members.

Roslyn Bremer—who unlike most communications specialists, has academic speech training—runs Communi-Vu, a company offering individualized instruction and programs tailor-made for people in business. "Professionalism makes a person qualified in his field, depending on skills and training," Miss Bremer said. "That has nothing to do with the ability to communicate effectively."

A test run before Miss Bremer's cameras is instructive. As an amateur begins to read from a sample text that Miss Bremer has specially marked to make the inflections more obvious, she is obviously committed, gesturing emphatically when the speaker lingers and nodding vigorously when a point is well made.

There is nothing like seeing oneself in the mirror and there is no substitute for the video playback. As the tape rolls, the swallowed sentences and hunched posture become all too obvious, to even the uninitiated.

Executives who have participated in Communispond's course voice similar reactions. Herbert Schmertz, vice president for public affairs of the Mobil Oil Corporation, said that the recent oil embargo and energy crisis had forced the company's executives into more and more radio and television programs. "But the average guy had never been exposed to that process," he said. The company trained about 45 executives through Communispond. "We found it useful as a way to overcome the fear of the radio and TV process, rather than to learn new techniques."

Career-Changers Force Colleges to Adjust

established a center to help returning students "gain confidence and receive general supportive services," the college's president, George T. Potter said.

"We need," says Dr. Kermit C. Morrissey, president of Boston State College, "more people who are experienced in helping older students. And we also have to realize that adults who seek a career change, by reason of their motivation and maturity, will move a lot faster than our traditional 18-year-old student. So curriculum must be boiled down where possible."

Where degrees are not required, many schools, primarily community colleges, are breaking curriculum down into related segments so material extraneous to a basic skill does not have to be taken.

"We will see," says Dr. Allan W. Ostar, executive director of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, "a rapidly increasing number of public and private institutions modify existing programs and create new ones for their clientele. There will be new delivery systems for education. The very best faculty members will teach regularly in the evening, for example, something traditionally abhored by most of them. Schools will have to work much harder in all they do because they are dealing with a different consumer, a far more demanding consumer. When you're paying for your education yourself, your level of expectation rises significantly."

"Many of us still perceive the real the need among older men and women dimly because this phenomenon is so new," says Dr. Burton Blatt, dean of the school of education at Syracuse University. "I foresee the day very soon when we will in effect say to successful men and women who want us to help them to a second career, 'Tell us what you need and we'll plan it together.'"

"We will have to listen to these career-changers," says Dr. William A. Brotherton, director of extended programs at Memphis State University in Tennessee. "We will have to learn of their hobbies, their dreams. And when a dream is impossible—and a 45-year-old is not going to get into medical school—we will have to suggest that he consider a compromise, perhaps a paramedical career in a community mental-health center and then help him get there as quickly as possible."

The Department of Labor estimated in 1973 that about 800,000 men and women 35 years old and older were attending college full or part-time. Eighty percent of the older students attend part-time.

Colleges are begining to respond to the need, many sluggishly and many out of concern for their own survival as their projections show that the traditional 18-to-21-year-old student base will begin to drop in four years. But many schools are moving enthusiastically into this new education market.

Two-year colleges and urban four-year schools have become most involved with the older students. "Community [two-year] colleges are a natural place for career-changers," says William A. Harper of the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges. "Career development is one of the basic purposes of a community college."

The nation's 1,200 two-year colleges are already well-suited to helping students change careers. A medium-size school may have 30 to 50 programs in a variety of fields ranging from X-ray technicians to computer programers to paralegals. The average student age is 29.

Four-year colleges tend to move far more slowly to aid those who want to change careers. But there are exceptions. Boston State College is trying various approaches to help the man or woman who needs it. Ten centers within a 20-mile radius of Boston offer counseling, testing and classes. The school is designing programs of totally independent study in a number of career fields. Cooperative courses with other area colleges and universities will, if effected, allow entrance into a number of postgraduate doctoral programs.

Alverno College in Milwaukee, a private women's college, has developed several plans to help women change careers or re-enter the job market after years at home raising a family. One of these, called Making Alternative Plans, helps women find careers they want and in which they can succeed.

Memphis State provides "a number of opportunities in which older students can simply come here and touch and taste and smell and think," according to Dr. Brotherton. In one such program, called Move Into a New Identity, the average age of the career-changer is 33. The oldest student currently enrolled is 45.

A mid-career counseling course at the State University of New York at Stony Brook now has a waiting list. The school has been asked to give the course in two other communities as well. Enrollment is about evenly divided between the sexes. The average age of those enrolled is 42.

Some say more can be done. Dr. Alan D. Entine, assistant academic vice president and director of the Mid-Life Assessment Program at Stony Brook, says, "We must develop shorter programs for these highly motivated students. Where possible, more credits should be given for their life experience."

The person who wants to change careers but isn't sure about a successor career may want to start by consulting a local college to learn if it has a counseling center. Tests may be suggested to determine skills and interests. Interpretation with a counselor follows. Charges for these services are usually about $100.

Some schools ask the help of an outside professional resource to provide job-oriented career guidance. The College of New Rochelle in New York asked Career Management in New York City, to conduct a New Resources Career Seminar for men and women 25 to 60 years old. Students received credit.

If no local colleges offers this kind of service, ask its admissions department to recommend schools close by that may provide it. Check the yellow pages of the telephone directory. Some religious groups offer this aid. B'nai B'rith and the Catholic Vocational Guild are two of them.

A Bridge to the Working World

By FRED M. HECHINGER

A new search for a way to build bridges between schools and the working world has created the latest academic fad—career education.

In the early '70's, when jobs began to grow scarce and applicants flocked to any opening, employers, able to pick and choose, began to complain that few of the jobseekers seemed prepared for the jobs they sought. Meanwhile large numbers of young people—a disproportionate number of them black—were out of work and on the streets.

Educational theorists and their political allies responded to the critical situation by looking for better ways to teach children—all children—about the world of work. Sidney P. Marland, then the United States Commissioner of Education, made career education the focus of his agency's attention. The Nixon Administration, bent on reducing Federal expenditure on education, had wholeheartedly adopted the new idea because it seemed less costly than teaching programs.

The call for a closer link between school and work is hardly new. In the 1870's, Calvin M. Woodward, a Harvard-trained mathematician, launched a campaign to persuade the public that the schools were out of tune with a changing society, that they were training gentlemen rather than men fitted for work. He wanted manual training—not aimed at a specific trade—to be an equal partner in the curriculum for all students.

The traditional educators sneered. A spokesman for the profession said contemptuously: "There is no information stored up in the plow."

Unfortunately, Woodward eventually lost control over his early version of career education.

Potential employers were less interested in improving education than in the profitable opportunity to let the schools take over vocational training at a time when unions were beginning to impose rules on the management of apprenticeships.

Vocational education subsequently became a separate stream of American education, often the dumping ground for the less academically able. By 1910, the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Federation of Labor, in a rare show of unity, lobbied for Federal support of such schooling, leading to passage of the Smith-Hughes Act of 1917, which has supported vocational education ever since.

Over the years, vocational education has frequently been criticized for training too many students for dead-end jobs, concentrating on agriculture, for example, when farm jobs were in decline.

In the early 1960's James B. Conant, the former Harvard president turned high-school reformer, called for reliance on "the comprehensive high school" in which academic and vocational education would be conducted under the same roof, often for the same students. But like other critics of the conventional approach to school and work, Dr. Conant stressed the need to provide "marketable skills" for those pupils who would not move on to college.

How does the new wave of career education differ from the old vocational education? It is difficult to answer definitively because career-education proponents have yet to agree on a definition that covers all their current experimental programs.

Dr. Marland has suggested that the term "can mean" efforts to diminish the separateness of academic and vocational education; a way to make education more relevant to some students; a structure requiring cooperation between school, industry and community.

Career education . . . 'the controversy will not be quickly resolved.'

Most advocates of career education agree that its distinguishing mark is the permeation of the entire education process. In the elementary schools, there would be a consciousness raising process. Children would be given a view of the variety of occupations in which adults spend their lives.

In the secondary schools the link becomes closer. Students are introduced to "career clusters"—groups of professions and jobs in the same area of interest: health care, for example. Publishers have produced books and filmstrips around a cluster theme, among them McGraw-Hill, which has provided a series of manuals running the gamut from agribusiness and natural resources to "Exploring Occupations in Personal Services, Hospitality and Recreation."

Secondary students are encouraged to make tentative choices in fields of interest and begin some specialized course work leading to either a job or post-secondary training in that field.

Advocates of career education say that to ignore the need to train more youths in ways that will make them function successfully in the real world of work is to take an elitist view of the school as an institution that engages in the luxury of pure, and possibly irrelevant, knowledge.

They recall that every time American education made a turn toward practical service, as in the founding of the land-grant colleges in 1862 as an instrument of the agricultural and mechanical revolution, traditional educators denounced the turn as inimical to the real purposes of education.

They insist that to graduate students without a realistic view of how offices, factories or studios work, without explaining to them the qualities that lead to economic success, is to create an ever greater pool of those who are unemployed, unemployable or misfits in their work.

John Burwell is a member of the Cooperative Education Commission, which presides over a 60-year-old program in the New York City school system under which high school juniors and seniors divide their day between school and on-the-job training. He says: "Rather than let chance channel a young person into a job situation that may result in 40 years of frustration and unhappiness, career education provides ways and means to assess interests and abilities and train students from an early age toward lifetime career goals which are realistic and rewarding."

Finally, some supporters of career education recall the concern of John Dewey, America's most influential school reformer, about the growing phenomenon of children no longer knowing how things are made, something that children in a society of farmers and artisans knew naturally. Dewey coped with the problem by urging schools to let children make things in class—such as candles or baskets or food—and by introducing to the learning process the field trip—to a farm, a post office, a factory or a doctor's office.

Opponents of career education offer a wide range of objections:

They see the possibility of Calvin Woodward's experience being re-enacted—of business and industry being allowed to subordinate the real interests of the children and the basic purposes of education to the needs and profits of the marketplace. These critics reject the Dewey analysis, saying that Dewey was interested only in having children understand how the society works rather than in grooming them for service in particular slots.

They charge that career educators—intentionally or unwittingly—sort out children and push them into career tracks too early. They see in this the risk that some youngsters, usually those from favored homes, will be encouraged to go to college and move toward the top of the professional ladder, while others, usually those from disadvantaged or working-class homes, will be subtly persuaded to lower their sights and expectations.

Opponents of career education are particularly concerned that the trend may coincide with the strong and growing feeling among many political, social and educational planners that college enrollment ought to be reduced.

Enough experts and committed partisans are lined up on each side of the issue to make just one prediction safe: the controversy will not be easily or quickly resolved.

The ultimate outcome is likely to depend on the quality of the programs; on avoiding extremes, such as putting pressure on children or indoctrinating them at an early age, and on a commitment to objectivity in judging potential without regard to race, sex or economic condition.

Finally, the outcome will depend on schools and teachers understanding that, if career planning and preparation become part of the educational program, it is better to encourage youngsters to raise their expectations rather than to lower them.

"De Gaulle hated the Senate and the Senate hated de Gaulle," he said with a shrug, describing the political situation in 1969. Cynical about governments, left and right, Mr. Leguil was scornful of the fact that French women had not been enfranchised until 1944, and that France still used a guillotine. "Such a civilized nation," he said.

Albert-Paul Carton, director of the center, and a priest, had a fatherly way with students, admonishing them in impromptu dining hall speeches not to be habitually tardy "escargots."

Mr. Carton fights to have French spoken at all times—a losing battle when beginners of the same nationality find themselves within even shouting distance of one another.

"Forget as much as possible your native tongue. It is in speaking that one learns to speak," he insisted at every opportunity. The same admonition met the eye on signs in such strategic locations as elevators and rest rooms.

Students were broadening their contacts with French people through assigned "enquetes": interviewing the director of public works, for example, to find out why buildings in a certain quarter were being torn down, and getting neighborhood reaction.

The director loved to take the students on exhausting, 10-hour Sunday sightseeing trips—to Mont St. Michel, the chateaux of the Loire or the coast of Brittany. At 7 A.M., sitting up front with a microphone, he briskly addressed the bleary-eyed students, pointing out, with equal pride, ancient churches, vineyards and three-star restaurants.

Sighting mushroom pickers or hunters with guns and dogs, he exclaimed, "Regardez ça. C'est très français!"

As the days passed, barriers of culture, of strangeness, broke down. Students, between phonetics-class language laboratory or conversation group, were confiding in one another—in French.

The Issue for Blacks Now Is the Quality of Education to look at the payoff," said Elias Blake of the Institute of Services to Education. "We should be turning out 150,000 college graduates a year; instead we're getting 50,000."

Part of the cause relates to lack of money. Youths from poor families drop out more than middle-class youths, and blacks more than whites tend to be poor. Lois D. Rice, vice president of the College Entrance Examination Board, has noted that "74 percent of the high-ability, low-income freshman who entered college in the fall of 1972 came back for the second year; the figure for high-ability, high-income freshman was 90 percent."

Black students who make their way through colleges are likely to be in certain courses but not others. Partly because of tracking into non-academic work in high school, black youths tend to have weak preparation for such fields as chemistry, math, engineering and physics, according to a study by the National Board on Graduate Education.

As employers struggling with affirmative-action programs are quick to point out, quality also remains a problem. The country's more than 100 predominantly black colleges have done a remarkable job in educating students who enter with marginal academic qualifications; indeed, white colleges now send teams to study their methods. The quality of instruction of many of these black institutions remains low, however, and the efforts of those that are first-rate to further develop graduate and other high-level programs have been undercut by a "brain drain" of students and faculty members to predominantly white schools.

Recently, though, black colleges have enjoyed something of a resurgence in popularity, in part because some black students at predominantly white colleges have decided that the academic advantages of these institutions are outweighed by the social and psychological disadvantages of being part of a stressful environment. "If the environment is not congenial, then access is not enough," said Benjamin Payton, a former black college president now on the staff of the Ford Foundation. A salient commentary on the problems blacks face in white schools is that black colleges have one-quarter of all black college students but award half of the degrees.

A major element of the increased black presence on college campuses has been the emergence of black studies. A decade ago such programs were proliferating at a high rate; now they are going through a period of consolidation, with colleges self-consciously sifting out those elements that do not seem to be academically sound from those that do.

Nevertheless, black studies appears to have assured itself a continuing place. As Wanda Wells, a black graduate student at Smith College, put it, "Many black students at predominently white colleges major in Afro-American studies—or at least take quite a few courses in the subject. It is a way of reaching for something that is missing in their college lives."

At the elementary and secondary level little is known for certain about the effects of integration on academic performance—except for the fact that it does not seem to have a negative effect on whites. Nor are the results known of the billions of dollars that have been poured into Title I, Head Start and other programs designed to provide extra tutoring and services to disadvantaged students.

Most major studies of such programs have concluded that educational gains resulting from such projects are not sustained once the child is no longer receiving special help. Results of some individual programs, however, contradict this view, and some educators argue that programs succeed when they manage to avoid treating disadvantaged students as if they are "victims."

Good schools are breaking the link between poverty and academic failure

At the higher education level compensatory education programs are equally controversial. During the last decade colleges seeking to increase minority enrollment instituted special programs to help these students overcome prior academic deficiencies.

Today these programs are on the defensive for a variety of reasons, not the least of which is a widespread belief among alumni and others that there is no longer a problem of inadequate representation of blacks on campuses.

Also, some of the students in these programs found themselves inevitably, over their heads academically. In some cases, such as in the S.E.E.K. program at City University, the compensatory efforts drew fire for alleged mismanagement and even scandal.

Ultimately, however, the fate of compensatory education will depend on philosophical issues. Some say that, whatever the deficiencies of the programs may have been, the fact they have propelled even a minority of their participants into the mainstream of American middle class life makes them worthwhile. Others say that they are unwisely pushing large numbers of individuals into situations for which they are not prepared. Furthermore, the nation's courts are showing themselves to be increasingly responsive to cries of "reverse discrimination."

Blacks continue to fare poorly in relation to the one area of education where Federal and state funding is growing: special education. In Dallas, Tex., for example, Verna Thomas, who is black, found that although her son scored over 100 on a school-administered I.Q. test, he was placed in a special program for the retarded where, she reported, the children "just played, popped corn and danced."

It was not, apparently, an atypical case. In 1971 Jane Mercer, a sociologist, found in a study of the social and cultural factors involved in diagnosing and labeling children that a disproportionate number of children from poor and minority families were labeled mentally retarded. She attributed it largely to discriminatory interpretation of test scores by school personnel.

One suggestion that special programs aimed at the disadvantaged have had some effect came this fall when the National Assessment of Educational Progress reported substantial gains for the first time in the reading achievement of 9-year-old blacks. The Federally financed research effort found that black performance increased by 4.8 percent, or four times the rate among whites, between 1971 and 1975.

On the other hand, the study reported, 13-year-old blacks showed no signs of closing a 17-point gap between themselves and white students, and 19-year-old blacks remain at 19 points below their white counterparts.

In many areas, especially in the South, blacks have gained control of entire school systems, and this had led in some cases to substantial improvements in educational quality. Blacks, though, remain underrepresented in most positions of authority in American education. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, using data from 1973, estimates that although blacks constitute 15 percent of the school children, they represent only 6 percent of top administrators, 8 percent of principals, 15 percent of assistant principals, 11 percent of elementary-school teachers and 8 percent of secondary-school teachers.

A conspicuous exception to the success resulting from black control of some Southern districts is the situation in metropolitan central cities, where more than half of black students reside. In places like Atlanta and Newark blacks have had no more success than their white predecessors in improving academic conditions.

This points up what is now coming to be widely regarded as the central issue in black education: the correlation between poverty and low achievement.

Blacks, over the last two decades have succeeded at the highest levels of education once the barriers were broken. But the problem of poverty remains. If an American child happens to be black, the chances are very good that the child is poor. And despite hundreds of millions of dollars that have gone into the effort, American educational institutions have not yet learned how to overcome the cultural gaps involved and successfully educate poor students, whatever their race.

The correlation between poverty and academic failure, though, can be misinterpreted. It may be descriptive but it is not necessarily determinative. Individual schools such as Public School 31 in the Bronx have developed techniques of individualized instruction and showed conclusively that poor students can perform at high levels. The problem is that thus far no one has shown how to do this on a system-wide basis.

"The fact that there is a relation between socio-economic status and achievement does not mean that this is an irreversible law," Bernard R. G[illegible]ford, deputy chancellor of the New York City school system, said. "Our job is to break that relation."

...re also signs that dropout ...ing in high schools—es...d for the first time, among black women. Finally, the vote of college-going seems to depend on income levels. Thus the prospect of increased black college attendance may be precluded by bleak prospects of improved black income.

"If our students get relegated to two-year colleges, we're in trouble," Larry Barclay, director of minority affairs for the College Entrance Examination Board in New York City, said. "The dropout rate is higher in two-year colleges, and that is significant."

Alexander W. Astin of the University of California at Los Angeles, who has studied the consequences of blacks' choices of colleges, said that it was a mistake to ignore the kind of colleges selected.

"Indeed, with the proliferation of public community colleges and the substantial resources of financial aid now available to needy students, the real issue of access is not who goes to college, but who goes to college where," Dr. Astin wrote in "The Myth of Equal Access in Public Higher Education."

Dr. Astin divided the nation's colleges into seven categories based on selectivity, ranging from two-year colleges to highly selective universities. He ranks the colleges by grade averages of incoming high school seniors.

He found that minority students and students from families with the lowest income are concentrated in two-year schools and the least selective four-year colleges.

Dr. Astin noted that the least selective schools were most likely to have inferior equipment, smaller libraries, and lower-paid teachers. Furthermore students in this category were least likely to have the enriching experience of living on campus, Dr. Astin found.

Students who are denied access to the universities and more selective four-year colleges—including a disproportionate share of the low-income and minority students—receive substantially less public subsidy for their postsecondary education than do students who manage to enter the more selective public colleges and universities.

Since virtually all colleges require a high school diploma for admission, a large and persistent high school dropout rate among blacks is a serious impediment to long-range improvement in college attendance.

In a report soon to be published by the Howard University Institute for the Study of Educational Policy, researchers found that in the fall of 1974 there were 10.3 million high school dropouts between the ages of 16 and 34—the age range of the college availability pool.

Blacks, about 11 percent of that population group, accounted for 18 percent of the dropouts. About 7,255,000 black people between the ages of 16 and 34 were thus disqualified from higher education.

In a sampling of incoming freshmen in the fall of 1973, about 12 percent of first-year students in two-year colleges were from minorities, the majority black. In the least selective four-year colleges, about 19 percent of the first-year students were black.

By contrast, only 5 percent of students going to highly selective four-year colleges or universities were from minority groups.

The performance of blacks on college entrance tests tends to be low, and the lower scores, according to the Howard study, appear linked to both race and relatively low incomes.

The study found an overconcentration of black graduate students in certain areas. Nearly 60 percent of the doctorates earned by blacks were in education. Only 25 percent of doctorates earned by the population as a whole were in that field, the study said.

The Howard researchers found, paradoxically, that at lower income levels proportionally more blacks go to college than whites. In families who make $25,000 or more, blacks, on a proportional basis, attend college less. Their conclusion is that well-to-do black youths, even more than their white counterparts, tend to see college education as only marginally important to a successful life.

Blacks are even farther from parity with whites in attending graduate and professional schools. While minority men and women, among whom blacks predominate, form 16 percent of the population, they account for less than 6 percent of all students in masters or doctorate programs in the nation. This statistic does not include people of Asian descent.

According to a study by the National Board on Graduate Education, only 3.5 percent of the doctorates given in 1974 were to United States-born blacks.

The study found an overconcentration of black graduate students in certain areas. Nearly 60 percent of the doctorates earned by blacks were in education. Only 25 percent of doctorates earned by the population as a whole were in that field, the study said.

Black access to graduate education is limited because blacks are not getting undergraduate degrees in adequate numbers. Blacks got only 5.3 percent of the bachelor's degrees granted in 1974—and half those degrees were from black colleges. This pattern has held for many years, in spite of expanded enrollment of blacks in predominantly white colleges.

Other obstacles to attending graduate schools, which may be encountered by students of any race, include high cost, conflicting family obligations and poor undergraduate preparation.

Blacks, however, very often encounter these problems in combinations, making continued higher education virtually impossible. The report by the National Board on Graduate Education put it this way:

"Upon graduation from college, immediate employment opportunities may appear more rewarding than advanced study in view of the prospect of further financial difficulties, the academic risk of graduate study (about one-half of all doctoral candidates fail to complete the Ph.D. degree), and labor market uncertainties."

Other hurdles trip blacks—frictions between minority students and white faculties, conflicts between the research interests of ethnic-conscious students and more traditional scholars who teach them and a pause in affirmative-action programs because of legal uncertainties.

Benjamin Payton, an education specialist at the Ford Foundation, summed up the outlook on black access to both undergraduate and graduate education when he said: "Given all of the categorical barriers that hinder blacks, they are simply going to require more visible signs that education pays, and pays enough."

Dr. Daniel C. ...n, a sociologist and vice presi-dent of Dillard University in New Orleans, was one. He said that many of the transfers were students who, for various reasons, did not adjust to major schools, adding, "Why would an 'A' student at Yale transfer to a black school or any other school?"

The New York Times/Michael Dressler

Students at Morehouse College

Dillard's president, Dr. Samuel Dubois Cook, predicted that only about half of the 51 private black colleges would survive. He, Dr. Gloster and numerous educators said that only those schools that were able to demonstrate to students that the schools offered a quality education would last.

Significantly, more black educators today feel free to talk about quality and the possibility that some of the schools are not worth saving. Five years ago, they would have been run out of the community, one remarked.

"We've got to stop making excuses for schools that miseducate. If Dillard graduates can't compete in the American culture, then Dillard has no right to survive, said Dr. Cook, confident that Dillard is a quality school.

Tied to quality, of course, is administrative policy. Professors at one of the more aggressive schools criticized the administration for looking for programs that attract Federal dollars but that did not necessarily fit into the needs of students or the priorities of the institution.

The concern about quality is evident among black students. Dr. Thompson's daughter, Wilma Sarah, reported that among her circle of 10 friends, only three elected to attend black schools. She chose Fisk University in Nashville, but the others went to Loyola, Tulane, Radcliffe, Yale and Brown.

Rachel Lynn Bell, of Gary, Inc., majored in communications at Hampton Institute in Virginia, considered one of the better colleges. She attended a black school because her parents went to black schools. But she said she felt cheated, that her education was less than adequate and she should have gone to Indiana University instead.

"I didn't leave Hampton with the same enthusiasm I went there with. I and a lot of other students I knew felt stifled," remarked Miss Bell, who graduated last June.

"I went out of a sense of dedication, but found out the administration was weak, we didn't have the money for equipment for use in class. Students know when they are being bulled," she said.

Valorie Branch, a student in the School of Social Work at Atlanta University, was dissatisfied with her education at the Atlanta graduate school as well as her undergraduate school, Southern University in Baton Rouge, La. She attended Spelman College in Atlanta for 11 days before transferring to Southern.

"The atmosphere at Spelman wasn't for me. It was aloof and not part of the community. All the girls were the daughters of somebody big, and many were there to get a Morehouse man," she remarked.

"Southern was better, though not much. I participated in community projects. But no, I wasn't satisfied with the education I got there, or that I am getting at A.U. Very few instructors were challenging. My college experience didn't teach me to think, but to absorb material like a sponge and spew it back."

Nevertheless, Miss Branch, who is from New Orleans, said she never considered a predominantly white school and would elect to attend a black school in the future.

"I wouldn't have been comfortable at Tulane in New Orleans. I didn't feel I needed to subject myself to additional pressures. I felt I would have been on stage, and I didn't want that," she said.

Her classmate, Kim St. Bernard, of Brooklyn, was satisfied with her education at black schools. She had visited Cornell, Dartmouth and other Eastern schools before going to Morgan State University in Baltimore for her undergraduate work.

"I found those schools too big and impersonal, and too much pressure there. Even the big black schools are not as impersonal. The teachers know you by name and the students are closer to each other than I found at white schools," she said.

Some blacks are returning to black campuses out of a sense of commitment, others out of frustration in attending predominantly white high schools, or other bad experiences with integration.

"They're coming back because they realize we're the ones who can help them overcome disadvantages that sometimes occur in the home, the school and the community," Dr. Gloster of Morehouse said.

The black colleges have been able to take marginal students, and even some with very poor high school records, and graduate them through remedial courses that many of the predominantly white schools now emulate —but still not with the success of the black colleges, according to some educators, who feel that that has been the major contribution of black colleges to American society.

"We don't bring them in and flunk them right out," one educator said.

On every black campus, teachers and administrators repeated the belief that they succeed with the poor and marginal student because of the atmosphere of acceptance they have created; that they are more patient and sensitive to the needs of such a student than bigger schools. Therefore, the pressure on the student is reduced, allowing him to proceed at a slower pace until he can step it up—"something the big schools can't or won't do," Dr. Gloster commented.

Yet, that is another aspect of the dilemma facing the schools. Competition between all colleges, black and white, will be much sharper in the 1980's as the impact of the drop in the birthrate is felt. Thus, schools will be vulnerable to enrollment declines and will have to make their programs more attractive.

Black schools desiring to take poor and marginal students will be hard-pressed to do so. And there is debate among educators about how extensive this practice should be anyway.

The main problem facing private schools is financial. But there are also problems caused by predominantly white schools taking over functions once exclusively exercised by black institutions, such as remedial education; competition between good black colleges and bad ones, and desegregation.

Dr. E. Oscar Wolfork, dean at Fisk, said a major contribution of black schools was "taking ill-prepared students coming from poor or segregated schools and turning them into productive citizens. That is the strength of the black college, that is the job it has taken on."

Some help has come from various sources, including the Federal Government, different church denominations and foundations such as the Ford Foundation. In the last six years, the Ford Foundation has pumped more money into black schools than possibly any other single organization.

Dr. Gloster said the responsibility of black colleges was twofold: "To give students a good academic preparation for their chosen professions, and to develop a sense of responsibility for helping solve the race problem in this country and the world."

He said it was not accidental that Martin Luther King Jr. was a product of Morehouse. Dr. Cook, also a Morehouse graduate, said: "Harvard could not have produced Dr. King; it would have stifled him."

"We have been hurt by the bigger schools going after the best black students, and we are still seeing it happen. But we feel the tide is turning and a few schools, Morehouse included, are better able to compete now, and will survive in excellent shape," Dr. Gloster predicted.

'Here I am exposed to the real world'

By REGINALD STUART

PORTLAND, Ore.—When predominantly white colleges and universities in the United States began placing emphasis in the late 1960's on raising the proportion of blacks on their campuses as students and employees, Portland State University joined the effort in a major way.

While the institution, the state's only urban public college, did not receive as much publicity as larger Eastern and Southern schools, it established special recruitment, financial aid, counseling and academic programs aimed at blacks. It was the first white college to hire a black as head football coach. It has had a black to serve as dean of academic affairs and has seen a black serve as president of the student government association.

But a feeling persists on the campus, situated on the edge of the city's business district, that a void still exists. Black students and faculty feel it. So does the college's president.

"I think the bloom is off," said Dr. Joseph C. Blumel, president of Portland State since May 1974. "In a sense, there's been a huge leap in the general acceptability of the need, but that's been accompanied by a lessening sense of urgency," he said.

What bothers many people concerned with black presence on this campus is the deep feeling that the enthusiasm has worn off for bringing more blacks here, despite the fact that fewer than 15 of 600 faculty members are black, 400 of the estimated 15,000 students are black and there is only one minority person in the administration.

Since 1968, Portland State, started as an extension school shortly after World War II and elevated in 1955 to the status of a degree-granting four-year college, has taken several steps to attract more black students and faculty members. In 1955, after winning approval from state education authorities to make exceptions to standard entrance requirements, it established "Operation PLUS," a program that recruited students, provided them with counseling and guidance, financial aid, housing and tutors, to name a few services.

In 1969, a Black Studies Department was established at the main campus. It has since been supported by state rather than Federal funds, which have been provided inconsistently. Although still a small operation, it is perhaps Portland State's most prized effort. There is also the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Scholarship Fund.

At about the same time, Portland State's black students, dissatisfied with the school's response to the needs, wants and desires of blacks, established the Black Student Union to deal with cases of racial discrimination and with issues of school policy that did not reflect the interest of blacks.

"For me this school is a struggle, it has nothing for me to relate to," said Michael R. Booker, a 22-year-old junior at Portland State, majoring in business administration and studying in the Black Studies certificate program.

"What has happened here is that we have built institutions within this school that will help students to grow here," said Mr. Booker, who writes in his spare time, is an active member of the Black Student Union and participates in one of three black businesses, organized by black students.

"I'd rather be at an all-black school," he said, "but here I'm getting exposed to everything I'll have to deal with in the real world."

That blacks have no sense of belonging to the Portland State community, as loosely knit as it is, prevails in the thinking of most students here and in the minds of many teachers.

Blacks at white institutions report that they are often made aware of their race in sometimes embarrassing ways. "They seem to forget that we are students," said a 20-year-old junior at Wheaton College in Norton, Mass. "And they expect us to be experts on everything that involves blacks. I had a teacher once who introduced the subject of welfare in a class and then, looking right at me, the only black in the class, asked if 'anyone' had any personal examples. The girl siting directly in front of me was so sure that I had some, she just turned around, and propped her chin on her hand and waited expectantly for me to speak.

As at many traditionally white schools throughout the nation, some new approaches are being considered at Portland State and some changes are being made in past procedures.

For example, the institution is seriously considering merging its program of black recruitment into its regular recruitment program in hopes of broadening its activities among blacks.

Despite the negative impressions he expressed about Portland State, Mr. Booker voiced the sentiments of a number of other black students and black faculty members who suggested that more blacks should come here because of all the institutions in the state it had, in their opinion, the best potential for meeting the needs of blacks.

"We should be here," said Mr. Booker. "There definitely should be more of us on this campus. Why should we let them have this to build what they want? The black community needs to build, too."

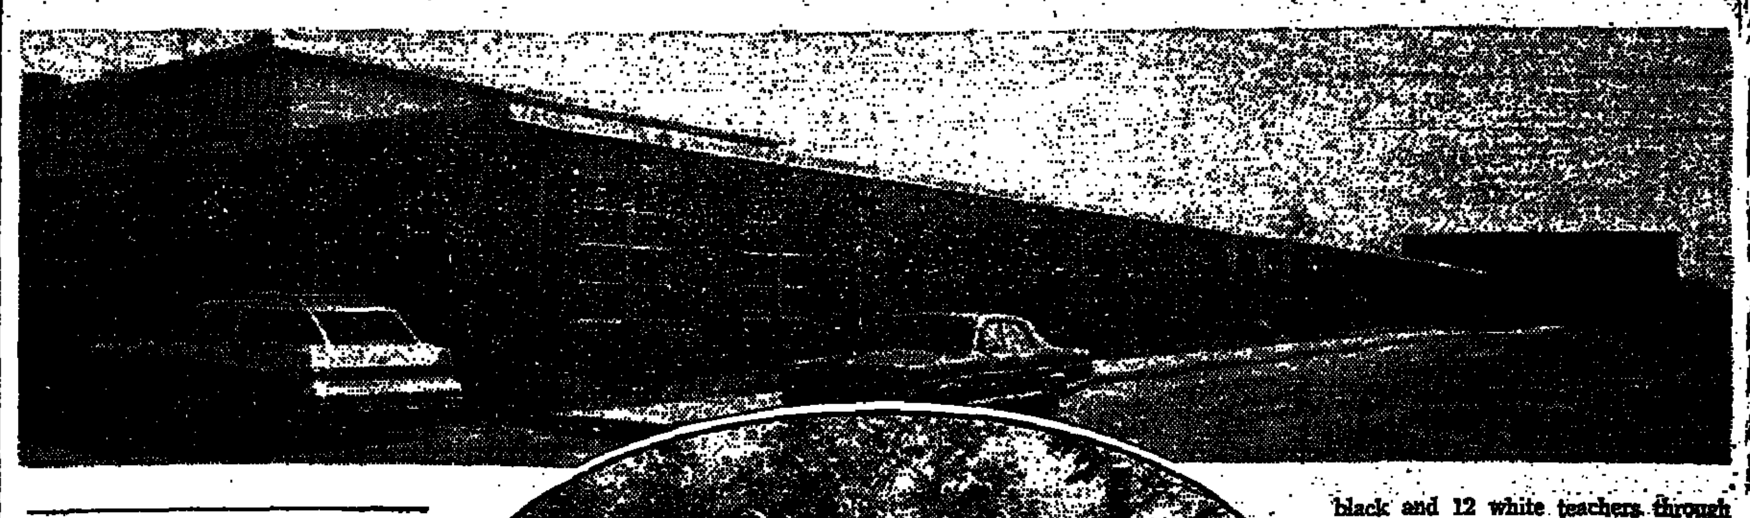
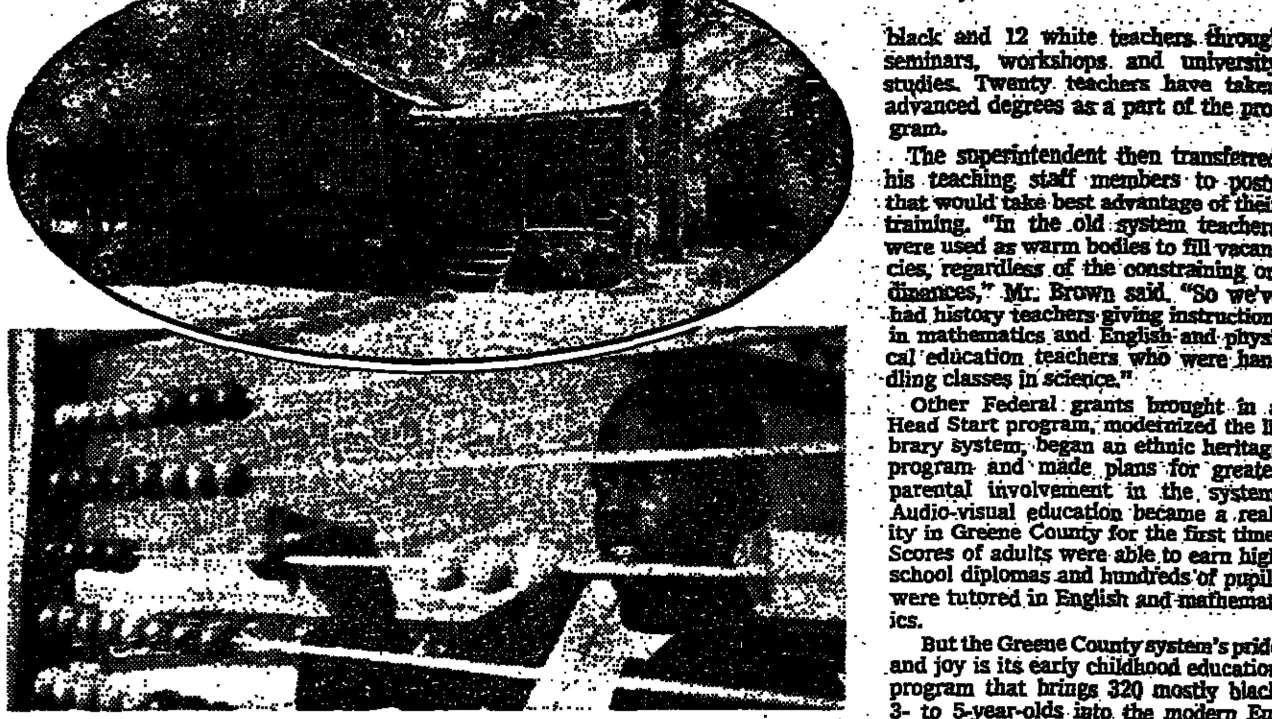
When Blacks Run the Schools





The New York Times/Michael Dressler

By THOMAS A. JOHNSON

EUTAW, Ala.—The Greene County school buses, leaving trails of yellow dust on the back country roads, gather the poor black children from their see-through clapboard shacks and carry them daily to some of the most modern, innovative and expensive education in this state.

In a county where blacks took control of the school board in 1970—as they have done in about 30 of the nation's more than 16,500 school districts since the late 1960's—the black board members sought immediately "to take advantage of every Federal education program out there to try to compensate for a history of neglect and deprivation," said Greene County Superintendent Robert Brown.

Greene County, a predominantly black, agricultural area of some 11,000 persons, has an annual school budget of close to $2.7 million. The per-pupil expenditure is about $900 a year, more than double the expenditure of eight years ago and about $200 less than this state's top per-pupil expenditure. A Health, Education and Welfare official has said that "the money in Greene County seems well spent—that region and the nation will benefit from the education and skills being developed there."

The quest for Federal funds in this essentially black public school system—whites fled in the 1960's to avoid court-ordered integration—follows a pattern common to many school districts and especially those both rural and urban systems where blacks have gained control in recent years. Most such takeovers coincided with an active, black political movement and most were opposed by whites who may or may not have had children in the school systems involved.

Scores of interviews with some of the close to 1,000 black school board members—about a quarter of the total black elected officials in the country—revealed that they have broken into, as the East St. Louis, Ill., Mayor Bill Mason put it, "a buddy system" of cooperating and competing educators, politicians, labor unions, professionals and businessmen. "When you first take over you'll not get the cooperation of these power factors," said Mr. Mason, a school superintendent for three years before becoming the East St. Louis mayor 18 months ago.

Leo A. Lucas, the chairman of the National Caucus of Black School Board Members, based in Dayton, Ohio, said that resistance "is first felt as a money pinch in their budgets. Not only are they not generally helped with these little, inside tips, but the power structure simply gives less support to school districts as the constituency and the leadership becomes black."

The accomplishment and potential of Greene County contrast greatly with other rural Alabama counties where the cotton plantation slavery system has left largely black counties under the tight economic, political and educational control of whites.

It is not unusual in this region to see the school boards run by white merchants or farmers whose wives earn salaries teaching in the predominantly black school system while their children attend private, white academies. Such boards are generally resisting to the blacks who are now trying to defeat them at the polls, the whites on the public school boards have consistently used their positions to shunt public school supplies to private academies.

There have been many instances, in both Northern and Southern districts, of white-led school board officials simply refusing to apply for critical Federal assistance.

"This was especially true in Greene County," Rev. John Kirksey, the county school board president, has said.

Robert Brown, then a principal at the Paramount High School here and now county superintendent of schools, said that the previous board, at his insistence, had applied for and received approval for a Head Start program. But, he said, the white board members decided not to implement the program unless blacks stopped a boycott against local merchants who had refused to hire black workers.

The boycott was not stopped and the Head Start program was canceled.

"When I was made superintendent in 1970 I found the check for the Head Start program in the school board safe and I sent it back to Washington," Mr. Brown said. "Then we started our own dealings with the Federal Government."

One of the first Federal grants was used to upgrade the education and teaching skills of the system's 160 black and 12 white teachers through seminars, workshops and university studies. Twenty teachers have taken advanced degrees as a part of the program.

The superintendent then transferred his teaching staff members to posts that would take best advantage of their training. "In the old system teachers were used as warm bodies to fill vacancies, regardless of the constraining ordinances," Mr. Brown said. "So we've had history teachers giving instructions in mathematics and English and physical education teachers who were handling classes in science."

Other Federal grants brought in a Head Start program, modernized the library system, began an ethnic heritage program and made plans for greater parental involvement in the system. Audio-visual education became a reality in Greene County for the first time. Scores of adults were able to earn high school diplomas and hundreds of pupils were tutored in English and mathematics.

But the Greene County system's pride and joy is its early childhood education program that brings 320 mostly black 3- to 5-year-olds into the modern Eutaw Elementary School—in the heart of this town's white residential district—where they learn to read and write in a program that also provides three meals, naps and time for play.

As in other Greene County programs, involvement of parents and volunteers is stressed.

Parents are invited to come to school and explain to the children the work they do, the tools they use, the seeds they plant and the crops they harvest.

The black school board has provided for a new vocational school—construction is scheduled to begin immediately—and a two-year college, an extension for 150 students of the predominantly black Miles College in Birmingham.

A major aim of education here is to give blacks an economic foothold in the rural south, an area that many economists see on the verge of an agricultural-industrial boom. "We want to stop the pattern of black youngsters picking up a high school diploma here with one hand and a bus ticket for Detroit or Chicago with the other," Rev. Kirksey said.

TVA.
Power to the People.

That's what the 31,000 employees of the TVA stand for. Electrical power—and environmental protection—for seven states and six million people in the Tennessee Valley region. It's a vital, fascinating assignment and it takes imaginative, productive people.

It means environmental education, fish and wildlife protection and helping consumers conserve energy. But it's also our job to keep the lights of the Tennessee Valley region—as well as its people—working.

Resolving the conflict between energy and environmental needs is another TVA prime assignment. Helping develop new means to generate power (like the 400 megawatt Clinch River Breeder Reactor Plant) is one solution. Operating prototype units to make clean fuel from coal, as one part of broad scale air and water quality research, is another.

We also help develop better fertilizers to keep the world fed. And to keep the Tennessee Valley as lush and green as it is. In addition, we aid landowners with growth of the region's forest resources. And we help to plan new towns and revitalize old ones as the Tennessee Valley region continues to prosper.

As the TVA grows, so does its need for creative, dynamic and dedicated people, particularly those possessing technical and engineering skills. If this sounds like you, please send your resume to Mr. Gerald Shilling, Dept. NY, Tennessee Valley Authority, 313 MIB, Knoxville, Tennessee 37902. An Equal Opportunity Employer M/F.

In a Dispiriting War, One Little Victory...

By DAVID VIDAL

At 11:20 A.M. the bell rings. Fifth and sixth graders at Public School 31 fill the halls as they head for their daily reading period.

In room 407, 27 pupils from two classes have settled. "Okay, now you can pick up your reading materials, Group One," said Patricia Flaherty, the teacher. Each pupil has been tested and assigned to one of five reading groups of varying ability. Now, each one follows a plan laid out in one of five reading "contracts" or assignments on the board, and the 50 minutes of reading instruction begins.

The mixing of classes, the grouping within them, and the diversity of assignments required for such extensive planning particularly for elementary school pupils might make this method appear a luxury that only the wealthiest schools could afford.

In fact, this procedure is repeated three times a day to cover the 880 nearly all black and Hispanic pupils of a Bronx elementary school that is winning the battle to equip poor and minority pupils with adequate reading skills.

P.S. 31's building is more than a hundred years old. The blue and pink paint on its walls is fading. Nearly all its students get free lunch because they come from low income families. Of the 639 schools serving 356,000 elementary pupils in New York City, it is among the 383 that get Federal aid for disadvantaged students. The school is in District 7, an area that embraces the devastated South Bronx.

As the ethnic and socio-economic pupil constituencies of many of the nation's urban school districts have changed, the notion has developed that the greater the poverty, the lower the academic achievement.

But the success of P.S. 31 has been such that it is at the top of a list compiled recently by the Board of Education of "exceptional poverty schools," as measured by the percentage of fourth-graders reading at or above grade level. For P.S. 31 the figure was 53 percent, which places the school three points above the national average.

The school obtains its results this way:

¶ Reading is strongly emphasized in the curriculum; as many as three periods a day are devoted to it. There is a master plan prepared by the principal; teachers are required to have reading plans for their own classes, too.

¶ Pupils are frequently given diagnostic tests to measure progress and identify problems. Detailed records on each student are maintained for easy consultation by any teacher.

¶ Class and grade lines are constantly crossed to reduce the pupil-teacher ratio and to create homogenous reading groups. There are groups within groups, as in Miss Flaherty's class.

¶ At reading time every teacher and aide, without exception, is involved in the school-wide effort.

¶ Each class goes to the library at least once a week.

¶ Staff morale is high, creating an optimism picked up by students. There is a strong principal and an effective administration.

¶ Parents are trained to understand the goal of improved reading and to aid the school drive at home.

"We are constantly evaluating ourselves and there is nothing so rigid that cannot be modified," the principal, Carol Russo, said, explaining the combination of tradition and innovation.

Verna Henry, a parent volunteer at P.S. 31 who helps mend children's torn clothes, has two sons, Nathan and Daniel, who went to the school and are now in the ninth and seventh grade at a private school.

"The school told me they were so surprised that they were so well prepared, having come from a so-called poverty school," she said.

Vicenta Correa came to the Bronx from Puerto Rico two years ago and has four children, two already out of elementary school and two in the first and fourth grades at P.S. 31.

"When we first came my daughter Maria De Lourdes and my son Julio Allex knew no English. But within one year, Maria was able to get to her grade level in reading. The school really helped a lot," she recalls.

According to the principal, who once went to the school and who began teaching there 20 years ago, P.S. 31 "is mostly a traditional school," and its unique feature "is the way we modify programs and the scheduling."

"It requires a lot of effort and work on the part of the administrators and involves a lot of record-keeping," she said.

The role of the administrator in making such a school work is a big one.

"I had been teaching 12 years and had just about had it. Then I asked to be transferred over here last year and it was like night and day," Ron Eberlein, a teacher, said.

"There is just that certain something, a real sense of professionalism that starts with the principal and permeates the staff. The feeling has to come from the administration on down," he said.

Louise Patterson, an active parent whose daughter Leonora is in the third grade, said:

"It's really visible. The administration cares. They seem to know all the kids and they like them as people."

For all its success, the school has not been immune to the fiscal problems plaguing the city's school system, and there is concern that cutbacks will deeply hurt its efforts.

"In June we had 43 teachers, today we have 32. And of the 43 only 15 have stayed. None lost their jobs but they had to move elsewhere in the district. Now does that make any sense?" Mrs. Russo asked.

Staff turnover means that time dedicated to pupils falls, at least initially, until the new teachers grow accustomed to the complex system. Fewer teachers mean larger class sizes, making it harder to give pupils individual attention.

Enthusiasm has not dimmed, however. Mona Hollander, a teacher for 14 years, said she had "gotten to the point where I couldn't bear coming any more." Last year she joined P.S. 31.

"We had a lot of programs in my other school and I don't know exactly what makes the difference. But there is no apathy here," she said.

...While the Casualties Continue

By SHARON JOHNSON

Vernon Evans, a graduating senior at Locke High School in Los Angeles is worried. He has a B average in a college-preparatory curriculum but fears that he faces a bleak future.

"I got good grades, but it doesn't amount to much," said the tall, lean black youth. "Students get away without doing much work because no one cares if they learn or not. Blacks get diplomas just because they behave themselves, not because they learn to read or write. I don't think I know enough to compete successfully against white kids from affluent high schools like Beverly Hills."

The South Central Los Angeles neighborhood where Mr. Evans lives bears none of the scars of the 1965 riots that swept nearby Watts. The pastel-colored bungalows and tidy lawns look more like Westchester than Harlem. Still, there are differences. Idle teen-agers with worn football jerseys congregate on sun-splashed porches because they cannot find jobs.

Last summer Mr. Evans applied at 110 companies before he found a job at the Watts Labor Action Committee. He was paid $2.30 an hour to gather weeds and trash.

"Picking weeds is not a bad job for a high school kid, but I shudder to think that I would have to do that all my life," Mr. Evans said. "That is why I want a college education so much. A black male without a degree is nobody at all as far as employers are concerned."

Mr. Evans hopes to go to college in Alabama next fall.

"I think I can get a better education there," he said sadly. "I want to get away from Southern California because almost every kid I know is dead inside. Their desire to learn was killed long ago and so now they spend their time trying to look cool instead of studying."

Although he is taking two woodworking classes this year and has made his best grades in shop courses, Mr. Evans has decided against a career as a craftsman. He wants to be an accident investigator for an insurance company because he says the field offers excellent salaries and opportunities for advancement.

He has had a harder time making A's and B's in his academic courses, which surprised him because he sailed through such courses in elementary school. "I guess I had the A's but not the background to do real well in high school," Mr. Evans admitted.

One reason Vernon Evans and other young blacks are having scholastic difficulty today is that cutbacks in enrichment programs occurred at the time they needed them the most—the high school years.

As an elementary school pupil, Mr. Evans was enrolled in an after-school enrichment course in chemistry. He loved it, excelled and looked forward to studying physics and calculus. By the time he was old enough to study high school physics and chemistry, however, enrichment courses had been eliminated because of budgetary problems and so he found it difficult to maintain his head start in science.

In a sense, Vernon Evans and other young blacks in Los Angeles are a lost generation: they were too old for Head Start but too young for the experiments that Locke and other high schools have begun to keep the interest of their best students.

Today advanced elementary school pupils in the Locke area attend Saturday sessions at Los Angeles's Southwestern College where they get to do advance work and get a glimpse of the world beyond South Central Los Angeles.

Dr. Robert E. House, executive secretary of the black education commission of the Los Angeles Unified School District, is alarmed about the lack of achievement, particularly in the inner city.

"Thousands of blacks are being graduated today without having learned much of anything," he said. "The schools are afraid to keep students in a particular grade until they are performing at that grade level because it would mean that there would be 6-foot-tall 17-year-olds in third grade. Schools cannot deal with that so they promote the students simply because they have put in the time."

Dr. House believes that teachers must do "less babysitting and more motivating."

Thaddeus H. Hobbs, principal of Locke High School, which Mr. Evans attends, feels that schools at all levels must start enforcing higher standards. Locke has bolstered its curriculum and started programs to curb truancy in hopes of increasing student achievement.

"It is not unusual for a 10-year-old to shrug his shoulders and say, 'I failed, so what,' because he knows that under California's system of progressive education, he will still be promoted," said Mr. Hobbs. "One of the reasons why college-bred scores are low is that we have students coming to us from junior high school who are reading on the third-grade level.

Several miles from Locke's sprawling campus is the Watts Labor Action Committee's headquarters. There, Mrs. Jackie LeDay, a slim woman with an iron will, works with students from several inner-city high schools who are trying desperately to qualify for jobs.

"Employers are making the requirements higher and higher," she said, "and these kids cannot meet them because they have been shortchanged by the schools. Typing teachers tell their students they are doing well if they can type 20 words a minute, but employers won't look at anybody with typing speeds under 50. We have high school seniors who want to be X-ray technicians who can't pass seventh-grade science examinations, and honor-roll students who can barely read and write. Like Nero, the schools are fiddling while these kids' lives are going up in smoke."

AUTOMATIC TEST EQUIPMENT

A Concept Becomes an Industry that offers unusual career prospects in

- Electrical Engineering
- Computer Programming and Applications
- Test Programming
- Administration, Finance and Contracts

We make the systems that test other systems. Automatically.

Military aircraft, for example, acquired more and more intricate electronic systems—for navigation, communications, weapons control, countermeasures, radar, instrumentation and more. Testing and repairing them became too slow and complex for old "hand" methods. PRD saw the need, and pioneered a new field: automatic test equipment. Highly computerized and very sophisticated, it keeps planes ready to fly.

But the same concept of automatic testing can be applied to a great range of needs. One of much interest to us is non-military: checking out diesel engines, such as those used in trucks. But as you can well understand, the potentials are enormous. Though we have grown rapidly, we have really just begun.

You might like to get into this fascinating field with so much future. We would certainly like to receive a resume and inquiry from you. If we should get together, you will find PRD a most desirable environment for career progress. Once such pressures for statistical representation of minorities are created at the top academic institution the chain reaction of mismatching begins.

The nation created vastly increased educational opportunities for millions of veterans through the G.I. Bill without requiring them to be mismatched with their respective institutions. The bill simply left the question of matching to the institutions and individuals themselves. Programs for minority students often explicitly require mismatching—phrased as financial aid for students "who would not normally meet the standards" of the college or university in question.

Whatever the original reasons for such policies, they soon create vested interests in perpetuating this approach and standard propaganda to justify the position. For example, it is repeatedly asserted that test scores do not predict academic performance for minorities as accurately as for middle-class whites—despite an overwhelming weight of evidence to the contrary, and nothing but selected anecdotes on the other side.

Compensatory education is not really compensatory, and sometimes not even education. Humanitarian reasons are given for admitting minority students who do not meet the standards of a school. But the results are seldom humanitarian for the overmatched students. High attrition rates are only part of the problem. Even when academic pressures are eased by double standards, the stigma of such standards is felt by all minority students—including those who made it on merit, but who cannot be sure of this within themselves, much less expect full public acceptance.

This is completely unnecessary, given the enormous range of standards among American colleges and universities.

Compensatory mismatching is an artifically created problem. Its solution requires little more than understanding it—and refusing to support it. What minority students need is some way to finance their education and some accurate knowledge of where they stand academically. Both are hard to come by. But once these problems are dealt with, students and institutions can sort themselves out quite well without the help of academic empire-builders specializing in body count.

The much happier history of the G.I. Bill illustrates, in a very straightforward way, what can be done when individuals rather than institutions are the focus of concern.

The Legacy of a Decade

During the 1960's many American colleges and universities began to recruit a substantially increased number of minority-group students. Recognizing that many of them lacked the academic background of their traditional students, the institutions also initiated what came to be known as "compensatory" education programs.

Many of these programs have become well established and continue to function as before. Other programs have fallen victim to budget cutbacks, both local and Federal, and to what some see as a waning of commitment to the active recruitment of minority-group students on the part of the colleges. A few have been challenged in the courts on the ground that they constitute "reverse discrimination."

On this page are two articles, both by black academicians, on the wisdom of compensatory education programs at the college level.

By ALLEN BALLARD

The dismantling of educational-opportunity programs is taking place with little attention being paid to whether the programs were successful in achieving the aims set for them by the colleges.

No national study gives the simple relationship between the number of students admitted to the programs and the number graduated from the colleges. Yet a sampling of so-called "persistence" statistics from educational-opportunity programs in colleges as diverse as Berkeley, Southern Illinois University, Cornell and Rutgers would probably yield a pattern of 35 to 40 percent graduation rates for specially admitted black students.

Are the programs successful? Most, through a structure of intensive and special instruction in writing, reading and mathematics, were intended to give underachieving black students the chance of entering into the academic mainstreams of their colleges. The programs have had their faults, ranging sometimes from overprotectiveness to an overidealization of their students. Some have failed, by an excessive concentration on the task at hand, to maintain the statistics necessary to justify the programs before funding sources.

What's important to the vice president for budget and planning is not necessarily important to the person concerned with taking the hand of an academically devastated child and leading him gently to the point where he does not tremble upon entering a chemistry laboratory. And, it should be emphasized, practically no program came into existence without the major decisions concerning its form and substance being made by a college faculty or administration.

Most persons would agree that grades in regular college courses are a close approximation to gauging the success of a program. In 1967, I, as a young professor of political science not long out of graduate school and the director of an educational-opportunity program, began to read with anxiety and an impending sense of disaster, the transcripts of the second year's class. The grades in music, physical education and speech were dismissed with lofty academic disdain and I immediately fixed on the English, history, and math grades. As B's and C's showed up on the cards, pride in the students replaced concern and the ancient rebuke concerning "little faith" ran through my mind.

There could have been no more demanding judges than my fellow liberal arts deans—who confirmed my judgment—and myself. We not only knew the general content of the courses, but also the instructors from whom the students received their grades. We did consider it a success if a student with a 71 high school average was able to obtain (in competition with regularly admitted students with 80 averages) a C from a professor known to begrudge anybody a B. When that same student graduated with a B average, we thought him successful.

In retrospect, we were naïve for the attacks upon educational-opportunity programs never focused on such matters. If they had, there would today be no question of the need for their survival. The "big lie" that automatically equates the presence of large numbers of black students in hitherto white classrooms with diminished academic standards is more in keeping with what most people want to believe.

One can suggest some other indices of success in evaluating educational-opportunity programs. Is a program successful when a young man—previously nonadmissible and from a second-generation welfare family is graduated with the equivalent of a gentlemanly C and proceeds to start on a career ladder in the Civil Service that will ultimately bring him a $18,000 yearly income and permit him to create a viable family unit. Or should success be measured by a three-generational projection that indicates that the man's grandson will graduate (without special admission) from the University of Michigan's Medical School?

Is it a mark of success that the heavy pressure to recruit underprepared blacks has resulted in practically every "qualified" black student in this country being given a chance to go to college. Amid all the conflict and turmoil, has the confrontation of ghetto youth, typical white collegians, and the academy brought to each a better perception of American reality. Is it not possible that such preceptions will measurably dictate the directions that American society takes over the next decades.

Indeed, "success" becomes an almost irrelevant term as one wonders what young 19-year-old "underprivileged" youth, exposed to Rousseau, Locke, and Marx might someday etch for his compatriots a plan that might make this country wish that it had multiplied tenfold educational opportunities while it still had a chance. A glance around a bus, subway car, or trolley reveals numbers of black youth whose heads are immersed in volumes ranging from Euripides to Erikson's "Childhood and Society." That's the true measure of the success of compensatory-education programs. One should ponder long what will replace those books if society and academic know-nothingism snatch them away.

Allen Ballard was dean of academic affairs at City University from 1969 until September of this year. He is now writing a book on black Philadelphia at the Moton Center for Independent Studies.

Is Integration Aiding Grades?

By ROBERT REINHOLD

Do black children read better if they go to school with whites? Do they add and subtract better? Do they narrow the gap in achievement that has long separated them from white youngsters? What has been the tangible impact of a decade of often painful desegregation?

The answer is both simple and unsatisfying. We don't know—and, given the difficulties of experimenting with children, we may never know for sure.

"More than a decade of considerable research effort has produced no definitive positive findings," writes Nancy St. John, a scholar who has examined almost every shred of evidence on desegregation across the country. "It is doubtful that the canons of scientific method will ever be met or a causal relationship [between school racial makeup and academic performance] will ever be established."

However, it is possible to dispose quickly of one fear about integration—that it would damage learning among white children. In all the studies there is practicably no evidence that the test scores of whites, or blacks for that matter, have declined in integrated settings. The open question is whether they have improved for black pupils, presumably the main beneficiaries of integration.

It has been argued that this question is academic and irrelevant—that school desegregation is a moral, social and legal imperative demanded by both law and social equity. Indeed, judges largely consider evidence on classroom performance irrelevant in desegregation cases.

Still, integrationists have long contended that one of the evils of segregation was that it had contributed to the historically poor performance of black children, thereby handicapping them in this technologically and merit-oriented society. The landmark Federal report, "Racial Isolation in the Public Schools," issued in 1967 and used to justify many of the integration orders that have since desegregated schools, mainly in the South, drew a direct link between the number of white children in a black child's classroom and his achievement. (Others, however, have said this link is largely explained by different things, mainly the socioeconomic status of classmates.)

The corollary of the argument was that integration should improve the motivation and learning milieu for black children and result in better test scores. What is the evidence? A welter of contradictory, confusing and inconclusive studies, many flawed and unscientific, some showing a black gain, some a loss, some mixed or no effect.

Dr. St. John has completed what is by far the most scholarly and comprehensive review of the evidence. In her recent book, "School Desegregation Outcomes for Children," a review of more than 120 studies, she concludes: "Taken together, they [the best-designed studies] suggest that the achievement of black children is rarely harmed thereby but they provide no strong or clear evidence that such desegregation boosts their achievement."

The problem is that it is very difficult to sort out what is really influencing classroom performance. In some places integration was accompanied by massive curricular reform, which may account for observed improvements. Conversely, it was accompanied elsewhere by bitter conflict and heightened racial tensions, hardly conducive to learning.

It is possible to find teachers, principals and superintendants—particularly in the South—who will testify that integration has "worked," educationally.

But the more scientific evidence is less convincing. A few examples illustrate:

The evidence? A welter of contradictory and inconclusive studies

¶Goldsboro, N.C. Desegregation in this small city was accomplished smoothly over a two-year period and tests taken beforehand were compared with those taken afterward. The results showed significant gains for blacks, but also for whites; the black-white achievement gap was not narrowed by the blacks. As in a number of other studies it was found that desegregation seemed to help blacks with arithmetic, but not reading. Black pupils desegregated in the first year did much better in arithmetic than those desegregated in the second year, but there was no significant difference in reading scores.

¶National assessment of educational progress. In a report released in September, it was disclosed that reading scores for 9-year-olds had improved dramatically between 1971 and 1975, but particularly among blacks in the Southeast, the only area to undergo widespread integration during that period. Whites in the Southeast also gained, but not as much, so the gap narrowed. The study was not sophisticated enough to establish a cause-and-effect relationship.

¶Riverside, Calif. Extensive studies in this southern California city, which desegregated by busing its minority black and Chicano youngsters to majority white schools some years ago, have not been overly encouraging. One study, conducted by the school district itself, found gains in kindergarten and first grade but not beyond that.

Another Riverside study, done by two social psychologists, Norman Miller and Harold B. Gerard, was even less positive. Ten years of study, they say, have left them "profoundly disappointed" in desegregation, convinced "it was quixotic, if not arrogant, to have thought at the outset that sitting next to white classmates would cause Mexican-American and black students to take on good, white middle-class values, and enter the mainstream of American society."

Over all, they wrote in the June issue of "Psychology Today," "minority children did not gain in achievement, either absolutely or relative to national norms. After five years of desegregation they were about where they would have been if they had not been desegregated." However, they conceded their study lacked a "control" group of pupils who did not undergo desegregation.

But they did back up the view of many integrationists that it is the quality of integration that counts, not just mixing of races. They found that the teachers played a key role in Riverside, with some found to "contribute to a threatening, biased classroom atmosphere."

Such sentiments, along with the mixed study results, have led many experts to feel that the true educational impact of integration has been masked and confused by internal differences within integrated schools. That is, differences in such "variables" as teachers' attitudes, racial tension, black-white ratio, and teaching methods have largely been ignored in calculating the link between integration and performance. It may be, as some claim, that integration "works" under some conditions and not others.

Inner-City Option: Catholic Schoo...

By THOMAS VITULLO-MARTIN

Betty Porter is black, Protestant, and lives in one of the better neighborhoods of Chicago's South Side. She has taken her second-grade daughter out of the Chicago public schools and enrolled her at Holy Angels—a curious choice: it is a 1,283-student, all-black Roman Catholic school in the most impoverished neighborhood in Chicago. Seventy-five percent of Holy Angels' children live in the poorest one-third of the city's neighborhoods. At least one-third of its students receive welfare support.

But Mrs. Porter's decision reflects a national trend. Since 1970 the percentage of Catholic school students who are black has almost doubled, to an estimated 8 percent today, even though less than 4 percent of all Catholics are black. Over 210,000 blacks are enrolled in Catholic schools. In the largest American cities, blacks comprise between 12 percent and 60 percent of the Catholic school populations. More than half of all non-Catholics in Catholic schools are black. Why are such a disproportionate number of black non-Catholics, like Mrs. Porter, choosing Catholic schools?

She found the Catholic school to be much safer: there were no shakedowns in the lunchrooms at Holy Angels, and the gangs that plagued the South Side were not tolerated. The school was scheduled for working parents: children were supervised until 5:30 P.M. and the school's program ran through the summer. Parents' meetings were on weekends.

A three-year study sponsored by the National Institute of Education found in interviews with 500 black parents who were sending their children to Catholic schools that 85 percent of the parents believed that Catholic schools were distinguished by their discipline. Characteristically, parents linked discipline to academic quality.

Because they have so few parishioners—the traditional source of 55 percent of Catholic school budgets (an average of $75,000 per school)—black schools must rely more heavily on tuition, and these inner city schools have tuitions ranging from $225 to $776 per year, according to one study by the National Office of Black Catholics.

To keep costs down, some schools rely on parental help. Mrs. Porter took a job at Holy Angels, which like most Catholic schools, hires its own parents whenever possible. The parents ... for lower wages than comparabl... pay outside the school and are in... subsidizing the school.

THE INNER-CITY CHILD

BY FRANK RIESSMAN

"Twelve years ago, Frank Riessman wrote an innovative book arguing that poor children have significant cultural strengths, and that urban education can only succeed by responding to these strengths. Sad to say, the argument still needs to be made! Riessman's new book remakes it persuasively, drawing on new data, and offering sound and practical policies for reforming the schools. The Inner-City Child should be read by every urban teacher."—Herbert Gans

Law Is Having Its Day in School

By JAMES FERON

Virginia Schlotman's sixth-grade class at SS. John and Paul School in Larchmont, N. Y., was playing a new game, "Pass the Eraser," one day recently, but the rules kept changing.

Miss Schlotman had lines of students competing to see which team passed the eraser fastest, an observer recalled, "But then she stopped them and said 'Oh wait. I forgot. Pass only with your left hand'."

They groaned and started again, only to be stopped and told of another modification, then another and another. The frustration, now complete, opened the way to a discussion of the need for established rules, and the role of the law.

Miss Schlotman is one of 45 teachers in the Mamaroneck area—seven of them in two parochial schools and the rest in the public schools—participating in a law-related education project that State Education Commissioner Ewald B. Nyquist expects will be "one of the biggest curriculum changes in the next decade."

It is being paid for by the Federal Government and controlled, in New York's case, by the State Education Department. The projects are oriented in different ways. A New York City school is focusing on criminal justice, for example. Mamaroneck is the only district in the state using the project in all grades, beginning with kindergarten.

Elizabeth Baird Saenger, a criminal-justice volunteer and former teacher who is coordinator of the local program, said participating teachers attend weekly seminars "then weave the material into their instruction."

This year the weekly workshops in Mamaroneck, where Miss Schlotman picked up the eraser game a week before she used it, are dealing with questions of authority and privacy. Other aspects of the law, such as property and justice, will be taken up in later years.

Mamaroneck teachers, who are just beginning to introduce the program into their classes, are treating the idea of authority from several aspects—philosophical, historical, legal and psychological, for example—so that students will be able to define authority and understand its sources and functions while appreciating its benefits and limitations.

How to do it? "Role-playing is one way," Mrs. Saenger said. Teachers who attended a seminar at the Mamaroneck Town Meeting Hall "were asked to do what the children will be asked to do—establish the Town of Mamaroneck and its government."

A more contemporary version was used the following week by Gina Cane, a sixth-grade teacher in the Murray Avenue School in Mamaroneck, whose students played the parts of candidates and reporters in a classroom debate. The children had been asked to investigate the positions of the candidates they represented.

In St. Louis, two social-studies teachers, Mahe Ackerly and Lind discarded a traditional text up their own under the guid Legal Aid attorney, Phillip F

Law-related education, acco some teachers, is simply the n delivering a broader "values" tion. Commissioner Nyquist n summer that the days of "ind tion" were clearly gone. A Course to Lift the Spirits

York State wines, of which he is an aficionado.

"Next we do California, and then the classical French, Italian and German wines," he said. After that, usually, come tastings of cordials, champagnes, aperitifs, rums and—on the final day and to the accompaniment of the orange juice and grenadine needed to concoct a "sunrise"—tequila.

Except for the distilled spirits, all the liquids are served full strength. Rye, bourbon, Scotch, gin, vodka and various whiskies, all of which are tasted during a single one-hour sitting, are diluted with water to half strength.

When the tasting begins, the class splits into sections of 20, or 25 and each student is furnished with evaluation sheets on which to inscribe, for future reference, his own impression of each drink.

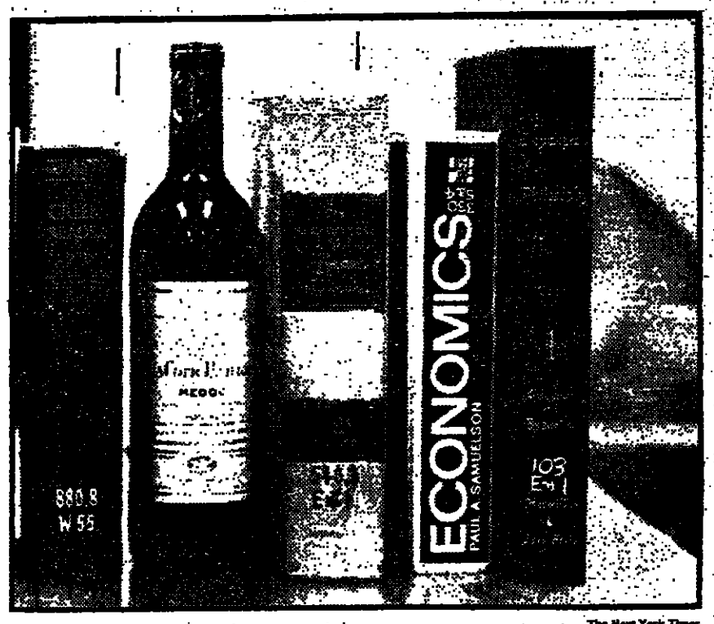
With tasting time theoretically limited each week to one hour, many students find themselves quickly imbibing a cup of zinfandel, for example, so as not to miss a sample of ruby cabernet.

"The course usually continued for at least another hour after class ended because we were usually so blitzed," said Natalie G. Blagowidow, a senior genetics major from New York City who took the course last spring.

"Above all," she said, "it was a course where learning was a great pleasure. Now I think I can walk into a liquor store and know what to buy."

Richard W. Kremheller, a junior from Lynnfield, Mass., majoring in agricultural economics, said, "I didn't take the course to get drunk. I basically want to find out about wines and I hope to find one I like."

Students who have already completed the course said it was virtually impossible not to walk, or stagger, away from class feeling a bit tipsy, and that was what they enjoyed most.



The New York Times

A student from Rye, N.Y., Thomas N. Linton, who is majoring in fine arts, said "I wanted to know what to order when I go out to dinner, and my roommate took the course, got buzzed and enjoyed it. We don't really get drunk, but we do get high."

Professor Christian, observing recently that there was "too much socializing" during tasting sessions, began to seat everyone alphabetically. But several students said the drinking encouraged camaraderie, regardless of seating arrangements. Many bring cheese and crackers to share, and lasting friendships have been bonded in bottles.

"I have found that the more they taste, the louder the volume in the room," said Professor Christian, "but I don't think it is so much that they are rowdy. They just have to express their emotions about having tasted some really good wines.

"No one," he maintained stoutly, "has ever had too much to drink."

WHAT IS A WINTERIM?
Funny you should ask... A "Winterim" is not a new cold weather lotion. It is a sure thing. "Winterim" is an innovation designed to solve the problem of how best to split a college year. "Winterim" is a short but full semester (January 5-22) of international travel, master classes, special physical education programs and selected F.I.T. major courses. Building a Community for the Deaf

Coach Wallace Cash instructing Gallaudet football team.

The New York Times/David W. Dunlap

DAVID W. DUNLAP

GTON—It is homecoming-llaudet Bisons. They are in ame against Anne Arundel e cheerleaders and pompom int a flurry of yellow and omecoming queen, crowned is enthroned before the.

of Gallaudet supporters are the cheers or excitedly dis- game. Yet, save for an oc- eam of joy or dismay, there sound in the stands. Instead, the crowd there is a silent, of hand movement.

t College is a liberal-arts 202 students in Washington. surrounding a broad green theastern part of the city, e mixture of low, modern, buildings and Victorian gin- owers. And every one of its rgraduates is deaf.

liberal-arts college in the the deaf, Gallaudet emerged nt form in 1864, when Con- owered it to grant college 1954. Congress reiterated t of Gallaudet. This fiscal chool received $15.6 million, cent of its total operating m the Department of Health, and Welfare.

's 3,034 graduates, accord- ard C. Merrill Jr., president lege, are regarded as the the 1.9 million Americans eaf. Last year, Gallaudet's ty came from 49 states and countries.

. Dunlap works in The ington bureau.

The school's goals seem almost paradoxical: The college exists to provide a complete and familiar community for its deaf students, yet it also seeks to propel them, upon graduation, back into a world dominated by those who hear.

Critics of Gallaudet have suggested that the best preparation for that world would be an education within it, not isolated from it. But Mr. Merrill defended Gallaudet's philosophy. "It's the hearing people who want to put the kids in 'normal' schools," he said. "But proximity isn't integration. Isolation is what happens if you leave the burden of communication to the deaf person in a hearing college."

Claude Stout, the student-government president, said the school had taught him "to be more independent." At Gallaudet, Mr. Stout says, the students are not confined or isolated, as they might have been at hearing colleges, but lead "really satisfactory" social lives, on the campus and in town.

Communication at Gallaudet is achieved by the "total" method, a simultaneous use of speech, finger spelling and the sign languages: Signed English, an exact manual translation of the spoken word, or American Sign (Ameslan), a language of its own, with a distinct and simpler vocabulary and grammar. Every faculty and staff member at the school must be able to use this "total" method.

Gallaudet's education of the deaf extends to young children, through its Kendall Demonstration Elementary School and Model Secondary School. Both are on the Gallaudet campus.

These schools are responsible not only for teaching the young through "total communication" but also for developing experimental programs for possible application throughout the country.

John S. Schuchman, dean of the college, said that "the saddest times at Gallaudet are the commencement receptions, when you can still see the gap between students and parents. The students don't want to go home—they don't communicate with their families."

Professors say there is an inherent difficulty in teaching the deaf. Most of the students "do not even know the meaning of language," Mr. Merrill said. Some 80 percent of the undergraduates are "prelingually" deaf—they were born deaf or lost their hearing before the age of 3.

"In political science courses, for example, English must be taught first before the class can go on," Mr. Merrill said. About 75 percent of the students attend the school for five years, the first year being a preparatory one to bring their language skills and comprehension to college level.

It is difficult, however, to compensate completely for language deficiencies. Jayne Lytle, an instructor in audiology and speech, said that students "tend not to watch television, because of the hearing problem and are not in the habit of reading newspapers, because of the vocabulary problem."

Classes at Gallaudet are generally limited to 20 students, so that teachers can easily observe everyone's participation. Desks are arranged in semicircles so that each student can speak to the others in sign language. But teachers of the deaf face a unique problem: If a student is bored or "lost" by the lesson, he has only to avert his eyes and all contact is severed.

Nonetheless, evidence of the school's success is obvious in statistics on its latest graduates, 19 percent of whom were accepted at graduate schools. For the rest, 85 percent of those seeeking private or public employment have now found jobs.

One of the school's most innovative projects, conversational foreign-language classes, was instituted at the request of students returning from Gallaudet's foreign-study tours. Their learning is helped by the use of "cues," manual signs made close to the face that clearly show what sounds are being articulated.

The use of "cues" is an experimental one. Phonetic symbols and videotape are relied upon as educational aids. And the deaf students enjoy an advantage over their hearing counterparts, for the teacher can speak two languages simultaneously: rendering a foreign phrase on the lips while manually translating it into English.

In building this unique collegiate community, Gallaudet has also strengthened the resolve of its members to commit themselves to a continuing fight against job discrimination and prejudice.

"We are the silent minority," Mr. Stout said. "This is why I am thinking about law school. I want to see the deaf get more legal opportunities because I understand their problems. My parents didn't talk much to me, but now, I can talk to the deaf children."

Lisa Berke, who graduated last year and is now one of four deaf law students in the country, said that the deaf resented the power exercised by those who hear. "We have never been able to control our own lives," she said. Jack R. Gannon, a Gallaudet alumnus who now directs the school's public relations, put the issue emphatically: "What's so good about being normal? What the hell is wrong with being deaf?"

the underachieving adolescent

He (or she) hears repeatedly . . . You're so bright. How come you're not doing better?

He's a competent reader, but fails English.

He has a poor self-image, so he either overstates or understates his achievements—academic, artistic, athletic or social.

Adults find him clever and charming, but in school he is restless, unable to concentrate, or sprawls in his chair, passively challenging the establishment with, "What's in it for me? . . .

SPECIAL SCHOOLS

Is Your Child Special?

Special children who have learning disabilities need understanding and special attention. The Lowell School (formerly The Learning Institute) has a highly qualified staff of approximately 1 adult to every 3 students to meet these needs.

We provide each student (ages 5 to 19) with a full academic, gym, art, music and crafts program. We also emphasize intensive one-to-one instruction with specialists in reading, math, language development, and perceptual-motor skills.

Through our own unique style and special audio/visual and multi-sensory techniques, your son or daughter will be exposed to exciting new materials which offer constant opportunities for success.

Our career training program includes IBM Keypunch Data Processing, typing, business math and English. In addition, your child can learn woodworking, electronics, auto repair, and photography (we do our own yearbook). Plus silk screening (we do our own greeting cards), jewelry making, cooking, baking, and sewing.

At The Lowell School, we offer work/study programs in hospital technology at a nearby hospital. Landscaping at Botanical Gardens. Maintenance and office work at several housing projects. And in the works — a program with the Mayor's Volunteer Action Committee.

Our college-oriented programs offer your special child exposure to English literature through novels, plays, and trips to the theatre. He'll explore algebra, pre-algebra, and get remedial help where necessary. Our science program will give him biology and chemistry. He'll learn World, European, and American history, art and art history, and French.

One dedicated adult to only three special children makes The Lowell School's warm and personalized atmosphere conducive to learning.

Call The Lowell School if your child is special. All our children are.

Small, Christian and Growin

By GEORGE VECSEY

Cheryl Goetter remembers last year's school—"how if the teacher said to be quiet, the kids would jump down her throat or just walk out of the room. If the teacher complained, the parents said their children would never behave like that. Everybody was mad and uptight."

This year, in another Huntington, L.I., school, the children respect each other and their teachers, Cheryl says, "and it's a lot easier to learn."

Instead of staying in public school, Cheryl enrolled in a small Christian school, where children and parents and teachers share the same beliefs and accept the same standards of behavior. The step Cheryl took is being taken by more students every year.

"I came here for both religious and educational reasons," Cheryl says. "We pray before each day for answers. It's good when people can talk about religion."

Cheryl attends the Huntington Christian School, a wing of the West Hills Baptist Church in Huntington Station. The school has expanded so rapidly in its 13 years that this fall it purchased the Woodbury School, which closed by the Huntington School trict several years ago when enroll dwindled.

The same is happening in many a in the New York area and aroun country. While private and reli schools have been a traditional alt tive to public schools, more and fundamental, predominantly B groups are organizing their own schools, most of them identifie "Christian" in the name.

There are at least four major o izations of Christian schools ar the U.S., with at least 2,162 affil schools and probably hundreds of filiated ones, like the Huntir school.

Christian schools are currently established across the country at a of two a day, according to the We Association of Christian Schools, b in Whittier, Calif., whose men have jumped from 68 to 511 i years.

There are at least 20 Chri schools across New Jersey, 4 in necticut and 11 in New York S including one in New York City, Flushing (Queens) Christian Sc founded in 1950.

In some regions, the Christian sc have certainly been set up in resp to busing and integration edicts. at the Huntington Christian Sc there are black and Hispanic chi in most classes, and school le stress they are not "escaping" an cial or ethnic patterns.

"We are open to all Christians," Thomas Gilbert, principal of the ondary school. "We have had Cath who liked what we were doing. have nothing against the p schools. But many parents feel is not enough discipline there. Chil are not called to account for h work. We are seeking to devel spiritual approach to life. God is creator and the sustainer of the verse."

Before any of the 247 students attend, their parents had to sign a trinal statement that they had a

Closing Suburban Schools Is Traumatic

By K. C. COLE

Commack, L.I., knows what happens when elementary school enrollments drop. Schools close, and the community is likely to find itself locked in battle. In Commack the problem was Marshmallow Drive. When the school board announced last year that two elementary schools would be closed this fall—one of 18 such actions on Long Island and almost 50 in the state in the last 12 months—it meant that some children would have to cross a heavily traveled highway carrying fast-moving trucks to the town dump. Parents and teachers took to the picket line.

"It's traumatic when you close a school," Eleanor Smith, president of the Nassau-Suffolk School Boards Association, said. "People get very attached to their little neighborhood school, to the close relationships that are formed."

Nationally, school enrollment has declined by 2,280,000 from its 1971 peak of 27,688,000. These declines have cut the New York State's elementary school population by almost 173,000—to 1,693,100—since 1972. Commack has 2,800 fewer students than the 9,000 enrolled in the peak year, 1969. "We dropped 707 kids this year alone," Robert Loeffler, community relations coordinator, said.

The district predicts a continuing decline to about 5,400 in 1978, partly because of falling birthrates, and partly because young families with school-age children can no longer afford the high taxes and $50,000 price tags on Commack homes.

"It's been the double-whammy out here of the pill and the economy," said Perry E. Bendricksen Jr., principal at Northridge elementary school, which absorbed more than 200 of Hubbs's students.

What brought out the picket lines in Commack was the way it was done, Rene Bloom, a leader of Parents Action for Commack Education, said. "The board was operating behind closed doors. And there was a total lack of planning; they built two new junior highs at the same time they closed the elementary schools."

Teachers and parents alike were upset—and puzzled—because Hubbs, when it closed, was by all accounts an excellent school in a new building with a capacity of 425 and an enrollment of 437. Four portable classrooms brought the capacity up to 525, but "we were just getting to the point where we had room for special programs," said one teacher. "They told us they wanted to close schools because there were empty classrooms. Our school was operating at capacity."

The board counters that Hubbs, like Southridge, was chosen because it bordered a far end of the district, because it was small, and because it involved minimal reshuffling of children. The two junior highs were necessary because enrollment in those grade levels was still increasing. As to the charge of operating in secrecy, the board points to a survey that it distributed district-wide offering a broad range of budget-cutting options. More than 85 percent of the respondents voted to save $550,000 by closing Hubbs and Southridge.

Of course, the 15 percent who voted no on Hubbs and Southridge were those who would be affected by the closings. "The Hubbs parents and Southridge parents didn't want their buildings closed," Benjamin Bell, president of the Commack Teachers Association said. "The parents in the other schools didn't want their buildings closed either, but they didn't mind if somebody else's building closed."

support the "ethical, subversive teachers who remain in the public schools, join the union and make friends there, and go through all the anguish of trying to maintain their values within the system while being dedicated to something very different. It's not so important whether you're in a free school or the system. The thing is to keep at it."

A number of the movement's leaders are still at it. James Herndon, author of "The Way It Spozed to Be" and "How to Survive in Your Native Land," heartbreaking and enduring travelogues of his own years in classrooms, still teaches at a junior high school in Daly City, a working-class suburb of San Francisco.

"It's where I make my living and where, with luck, I find my satisfaction. As far as a job, I wouldn't want any other," Mr. Herndon said. He is no fan of the effects of the reform movement, however. "The schools haven't changed except there's less humanity there," he said. "It's tighter and less tolerable. Most of the reformers really wanted the wrong thing: more conventional learning, more cognition, better basics. It was a cognitive assault.

"The reformers wanted every black kid to be a professor. If they didn't come out pofessionals, they weren't anything. That's the legacy the new teachers have inherited."

Vito Perrone, who committed North Dakota to open education as dean of that state's major teacher training institution, and Lillian Weber, who introduced the "open corridor" program in New York City, continue to plug away at the job and remain sanguine about the future of open education, although both admit there are terrific pressures working against teachers.

"It's a period of consolidation," Mr. Perrone, who is still the university dean, said. "Lots of schools have plateaued, but we still see many teachers struggle on, refusing to give up. While I don't foresee a time soon when schools are, on a massive scale, as responsive as they could be, decent schools are increasing."

Still training teachers at City College, Mrs. Weber believes that the move toward flexible classrooms is "a persistent thread, a direction not to be denied. In spite of all the doomsayers, we have moved on to research on the criminal for help, and more willingness on the part of administrators to support great flexibility and responsiveness. It's not systemwide by any means, but we've seen no retreat."

Some of the most renowned of the 60's leaders have gone on to other pursuits. Charles Silberman, who in 1970 made the bad-mouthing of schools respectable with his "Crisis in the Classrooms," a study backed by the Carnegie Corporation of New York, has moved on to an interest in the criminal justice system. Harold Howe II, who as United States Commissioner of Education during the Great Society years briefly gave the Office of Education the sense that it could bring important social change, is now vice president of the Ford Foundation.

Mark Shedd, the bold, young superintendent who took on the impossible dream of revitalizing Philadelphia's decaying school system, created alternatives by the dozen and infuriated bureaucrats and career teachers by the score and finally got forced out, now talks like a lot of other chief state school officers from his post in Connecticut about career education, program evaluation and financial dilemmas. George Dennison, who wrote "The Lives of Children," a book about the experience of a small, free school on the Lower East Side, writes fiction and tends a garden in rural Maine. And the brilliant Ivan Illich, who brought the movement to the end of the ideological line with his works on deschooling, moved on to an even more devastating critique of the health and medical establishment.

Perhaps John Holt's personal odyssey is the most telling. It was his "How Children Fail" and "How Children Learn" that first convinced many that schools might be different sorts of places "in which each child in his own way can satisfy his curiosity, develop his abilities and talents, and from the adults and older children around him get a glimpse of the great variety and richness of life." Mr. Holt, a veteran teacher, rapidly became one of the most popular of the reformers with endless requests for speaking engagements.

Then somewhere along the way, Mr. Holt discovered that the schools were not to be so happily changed. The school reform movement, he now believes, "was for the most part an illusion, based on a delusion.

"It never touched, in any form, more than at most five percent of the children in this country. In any serious form, it hardly reached even one percent of these few. The delusion it was based on was that the schools are failing, are not doing what they are meant to do. It now seems clear to me that the schools are doing, and quite well, what they have always done, what they were from the very beginning meant to do, and what almost all people want them to do: get the kids out of the adults' hair, rank and label them in a pecking order, prepare them for 'reality'—i.e., life in a modern slave society—a passive and joyless leisure and politics of ritual and illusion that have no power to shape events."

"Few adults," Mr. Holt said, "want or will accept for their children, in the here and now, an experience of life which is very different from the way they experienced their own lives. The problem of a better life for children, with more activity, variety, choice, interest, meaning and dignity, cannot in any way be separated from the problem of a better life for adults. Only as adults begin to find more meaning, choice and dignity in their own lives will they accept and demand the same for their children."

Clockwise: Mark Shedd, Charles Silberman, Jonathan Kozol, James Herndon, John Holt.

"At the time the chancery was building a half dozen new high schools," Sister Irene said. "Terence Cardinal Cooke, who was then a monsignor, told Francis Cardinal Spellman that this thing called I.T.F.S. would cost about as much as one high school but would service 30 times the number of students. Spellman listened and the archdiocese acted." Monsignor Joseph T. O'Keefe was assigned to create the system. The chancery purchased for $3 million some used equipment that R.C.A. had had on display at the New York World's Fair. ITV was in business. It began broadcasting on Sept. 19,

'You have to be a ham to work in television and I've been right in the middle for 5 years'

1966, from Dunwoodie Seminary in Yonkers. Its mandate was quite broad: to develop the electronic medium as a tool to extend and supplement traditional systems of teaching.

Sister Irene, then director of public development and relations for Elizabeth Seton College in Yonkers, was looking for ways to make the college more visible and to expand its services to the community. Working with the faculty of the Whitby School in Greenwich, Conn., she had coordinated a popular series of lectures on Montessori methods. "It was so well received that I got the idea of putting it on tape for instructional television," Sister Irene says. "At that point I was acting on sheer bravado. I knew nothing about TV."

By 1967 Sister Irene had assumed the job of director of public relations for ITV. Three years later she became director of utilization services, and in 1972, administrative director of the entire operation. Under her aegis, the fledgling station entered an exciting new phase of activity.

Today, at a nominal fee of $2 a year per high school student and $1 a year for an elementary school child, ITV covers almost every discipline in its broadcast schedule, including 59 courses on the elementary school level and 25 courses on the secondary.

As many as 10 repeats of regularly scheduled shows are aired between 8:30 A.M. and 3:30 P.M. in a given week. Using the system's "dial-a-lesson" plan, a teacher can request a program two days in advance.

A staff of 17, supplemented by student interns from local colleges runs the entire operation. About a fifth of the courses offered by ITV are produced in the Yonkers studios. The balance are leased from outside sources, notably Instructional Television Associates, a nationwide consortium of 10 Catholic systems.

"The television lesson is the most important supplementary tool a teacher can have," Sister Irene believes. "Used properly it can revolutionize education. It can bring to the child realities that would not be possible in the average classroom."

As ITV enters its second decade the system will send its signal in a number of new directions. Programming for adults is a top priority. Color broadcasts are just around the corner—$800,000 in equipment was recently added. Nine of the 13 Roman Catholic hospitals in the broadcast region will soon begin receiving special programming for both professional staff and patients.

"The worst sin I can commit is to let ITV's channels and studios go underused," says Sister Irene. "I envision a time when adults will gather in schools and parish centers to watch instructional programs ranging from cooking hints to sociological matters, from how to improve family life to how to enjoy the great books and works of art of the past," she said. "There's a plethora of people who are yearning for education, who recognize that there is much they want to learn and can learn. It remains for us to bring it to them."

The Subject Is the Land and the Sky and Yourself

By GORDON F. SANDER

CRAFTSBURY COMMON, VT.—One of the results of the ecology movement of the late 1960's has been a trend toward outdoors-oriented education, programs for youngsters interested in becoming farmers or conservationists.

Several dozen private schools have emerged in this alternative-school grouping and some educators regard them as one of the most exciting recent developments in secondary education.

The schools, which cater to students in their mid to late teens, vary widely in method and approach. One of the most successful is the Grassroots Project, an intensive, 30-week program being offered in and around this picturesque little town in the heart of rugged, northern Vermont.

Most of the 70 students in the project, now in its third year, are fresh out of high school, the others on leave from college. They have come from all over the country to gain insight into the land, the elements and themselves. The cost: $4,000, and an occasional case of the chills

Some of the schools, like Trailside Country School, in Killington, Vt., operate almost entirely outside the bounds of traditional education. A pioneer in the environmental education movement, Trailside takes its small, hardy band of students on a year-long camping expedition through dozens of ecosystems around the nation, often stopping for intense discussions of the group's problems and their obervations and experiences.

Staff supervision is kept to a minimum. The emphasis, in the words of director Michael Cohen, who also serves as chief pathfinder and chaperson, is on "spontaneity" and "making sense of things." Nature is the only real authority.

The Chewonki Foundation, of Wiscasset, Maine, sponsors a somewhat similar program called Maine Reach, an alternative school for 11th and 12th graders that uses the state's lush forests, its fields and harbors for its classroom and observatory. In addition to long wilderness trips, the students of Maine Reach gain perspective on the environment and its uses by spending brief internships with fishermen, carpenters, foresters and others who have first-hand, professional knowledge of the state's ecology.

The Grassroots Project, designed for a slightly older, more mature type of student, may well be the most rigorous of these so-called "wilderness" or "survival" schools. "The emphasis here is on practicality, discipline, and the learning of employable skills," says Steven R. Wright, the flinty director of the partly academic, partly vocational school. "If students have fun in the process—and I think they do—so much the better."

The Grassroots Project makes use of the faculty and facilities of Sterling, formerly Sterling School, which, until its "greening" in 1973, was a conventional boys' prep school where ties and jackets were required at mealtime and the boys were forbidden to mingle with the local girls.

Today the school is coeducational, and students stride into the Sterling cafeteria after a hard day in the fields carrying axes and wearing brightly colored hard hats. The conversation, like the food, is hearty.

When they first enroll, the students, who range in age from 17 to 20, declare a major in either "wild area services" or "livestock farming." Wild area majors spend most of their class time developing such skills as tracking, bridge building, woodlot management, white-water canoeing, guiding, mapping, wildlife identification, surveying, and chain-saw maintenance. Meanwhile, their counterparts in livestock are out tending cows, driving draft

'The thing I like about it is that it gives you an idea of your limits' horses and tractors on Sterling's 120-acre demonstration farm.

All students must take several chalk-and-blackboard courses in conservation history, botany, geology, forestry management and agricultural studies. Some of these courses are taught by instructors from the University of Vermont, in nearby Burlington.

Finally, everyone participates in the Bounder program, in which students climb ropes, crawl up high poles, and ford swamps and streams. The aim is to enhance physical fitness, as well as to prepare for the school's climactic, midwinter camping expedition, which is sometimes held in driving snow or subzero temperature.

The first Bounder meeting this term took place in the dead of night. Students were given maps and compasses, blindfolded, and driven to separate, unmarked locations 10 to 15 miles away. Then they were told to find their way back. Hours later, the students straggled back to campus, exhausted but exhilarated. They had just received their first lesson in map reading.

Mr. Wright, the Grassroots director, is wary of linking the school with the ecology movement. Nevertheless, he concedes that without it Grassroots, and schools like it, would not have been possible. "Ten years ago students blinked when you used words like ecosystem," Mr. Wright says. "Now it's second nature."

Obviously, the Grassroots Project is not for everyone. The school catalogue gives this warning: "It is neither feasible nor desirable to have a staff member in many activities undertaken by the student, including some that are inherently dangerous. Students not prepared to accept individual responsibilities under these conditions should not apply for acceptance into the project."

But responsibility is exactly what most students want. "The thing I like about the project," says Gary Neuwrith, a recent high school graduate from Middletown, N.J., "is that it tests you. It gives you an idea of your limits." Gary is undecided whether to go in for journalism or conservation.

About 60 percent of the students go on; others, using skills learned here, go into farm and conservation-related jobs.

Herrick C. Kimball, a recent product of Choate, is equally enthusiastic. He likes the way the faculty shifts quickly from theory into practice. "I learned more about botany in one day here," he says, "than in a whole year at Choate."

The culmination of the project is the solo, held in May, when each student goes camping in the woods for three days to ponder what he or she has learned and experienced over the year.

As Beth Miller of Philadelphia said recently, "After this, college should be a breeze."

School Is Only One of the Nation's Teachers

By LAWRENCE A. CREMIN

The ancient Greeks taught that "the city educates." They meant that the entire cultural apparatus of any community—its households, its schools, its religious ceremonies, its athletic festivals, its public affairs, its arts and its laws—shapes the character of the people who live in it.

We Americans have forgotten that teaching. In our preoccupation with schools and colleges, important as they have been to us, we have tended to ignore the fundamental truth that many institutions educate and that some are more powerful than the school.

Our very language betrays our tendency to think about education in compartments. Families rear children. Churches and synagogues conduct services. Libraries lend books. Museums display works of art. Penitentiaries rehabilitate prisoners. Newspapers inform readers. And television entertains viewers. Now, in fact, all of these institutions are actively engaged in education. Each in its own way tries to teach certain knowledge, skills, and values.

Consider a group of 5-year-olds appearing for their first day of kindergarten on a bright September morning. Most will have watched "Sesame Street," but beyond that they will already have been educated in very different directions. One has lived in a household where a grandparent has been a constant companion, telling stories, teaching how to do things and generally satisfying the child's curiosity. Another is already a latchkey child, trailing behind older siblings, spending a good deal of time with neighbors and tending to negotiate the world with considerable independence. Still another has been relentlessly instructed by zealous parents and teachers: in the living room, the day care center, the playground and the zoo.

Consider the same group of youngsters 10 years later. Beyond the fact that they will be taking very different courses in high school, their larger educational careers will have become even more diverse. Some will have learned a foreign language in church or synagogue along with a complicated liturgy of symbol and ceremonial. Some will have been scouts, Little League baseball players, stamp collectors or have camped in the national parks or traveled abroad. Some will have learned how to pilfer neighborhood shops without getting caught. Most will have watched television for thousands of hours, but they will have watched different programs differently.

> 'The cultural apparatus of a community shapes the character of people'

Consider the same group of people 20 years later. Some will have married and will be rearing their own children on the basis of knowledge gleaned from parents, friends and Benjamin Spock. Some will exult in learning anew with their children. Some will leave the children to themselves and the TV set. Some will read voraciously. Some not at all. Some will have worked at a succession of jobs involving a succession of apprenticeships. Some will just be finishing their studies in law or medicine. Some of the pilferers will be in jails.

As individuals, we are each taught by many institutions, and we each set out to learn many things on our own. Beyond that, the public is taught by many institutions, some of them public (schools or libraries), some of them quasi-public (television stations operating under the supervision of the Federal Communications Commission) and some of them private (families and churches). If public policymakers want to be intelligent about public education, they will have to consider the full range of situations in which education occurs and then decide where to invest what efforts to achieve which goals with respect to what clienteles.

It is important to bear in mind that other societies have used other agencies along with the schools to educate the public. The Soviet Union, for example, has used a network of youth organizations as an important instrument of civic education. Mexico has used the National Museum of Anthropology to teach a common heritage to an ethnically diverse population. The Israelis have used the army to integrate European Jews and North African Jews into a common policy.

We should not divert resources from the public schools. They need more money, not less, to do what they can do well. Nor should we mindlessly imitate the Soviet Union or the Mexicans or the Israelis, though we can doubtless learn from them. Rather, I am urging that we should view education whole again in its full range and complexity. Until we do we shall continue to make shortsighted policies that will fail, and then blame the very institutions that have tried to make those policies work.

Lawrence A. Cremin is Frederick A. P. Barnard Professor of Education and President, Teachers College, Columbia University. He is also the author of the newly published "Public Education."

American Children Go to Class Soviet Style

By LEONA SCHECTER

They don't give A's for initiative in the Soviet Union. During the two years we lived in Moscow and our five children attended Soviet schools, neither they nor their Russian classmates were encouraged to contribute their own views on any subject. Students had no chance to develop reasoning ability by arguing a position in class; the entire pedagogy of the school was directed against individuality.

Because the Anglo-American school in Moscow stopped with eighth grade and one of our children was ready for high school, we decided to enroll all our children in Russian schools. But the education our children got in Moscow was for life in a culture whose goals and assumptions were far different from those they now share with their American classmates.

In contrast to American emphasis on personal striving and individual creativity, the Soviet system stresses collective behavior. We encourage our children to be competitive so that their abilities can carry them to success in the free marketplace. Russians prepare their children for a culture where the highest goal is to work for the group. Soviet children learn to make their perception of truth and good agree with the version decided for them by the Communist Party, in the name of the society at large.

Collective behavior in Soviet schools begins with a uniform. Dark brown dresses with black aprons — white aprons on holidays—were the girls' attire. The boys wore gray pants and jackets with white shirts. The only spots of color were the red scarves of the Young Pioneers. Joining the youth group is a first step toward Communist Party membership.

Russian children are given written dictation to improve spelling and grammar. They spend most of their energy memorizing poetry, definitions, formulas and facts. The teachers called on the students alphabetically, and when their turns came, children knew that the best answer would be a word-for-word rendition from the textbook.

Penmanship begins at the age of 3 or 4 when elderly "babushkas" or grandmothers who care for the children while their mothers are at work tutor their charges in the use of fountain pens.

The curriculum, modeled on the French system, includes from nine to 11 courses at a time. Evelind took English, Russian language, Russian literature, ancient Russian history, zoology, chemistry, geography, physical education, home economics and technical drawing.

There is an atmosphere of strict discipline in the classroom. When the teacher enters, the students stand next to their desks and say, "Good morning, teacher," or simply stand at attention until told to sit down. During recess the children promenade by two's and three's in a circle in the hallway. Monitors keep them from breaking ranks.

Order seems to break down when the teacher leaves the room. Our daughter said that in the absence of the teacher, notes and answers flew across the room.

There were marks for everything. Each student had a daybook, Evelind relates, which "contained a list of my teachers, a page for quarterly grades and two pages for possible commendations by the director.

From the first grade on all students share in keeping the school clean. They are assigned cleanup duty, part of the communal way of life. They sweep, mop, wash the boards, water the flowers, shovel snow and pick worms off the school's cherry trees. For lack of soap they use bicarbonate of soda or crumbly chalk to wash the desk tops. Before vacation they pitched in to scrub the walls, windows and floors with rags.

Older children help the younger ones peel off layers of mufflers, coats, sweaters and extra socks, and help change from boots to light slippers for indoor wear.

What our children received in Soviet schools was an education for a different society from the one they would return to in the United States. Russians train their children to be citizens who will accept direction and won't question the system. They are taught to work for the community rather than for themselves. We train our children to be competitive in a capitalistic marketplace, to develop their individualism and creativeness.

We and the Russians gain and lose in different ways. They enjoy a less competitive, gentler pace in their everyday worklives, leaving more intensity for friendships and personal bonds. Soviet education created an atmosphere that was comforting and secure for our younger children. They knew what norms they had to fulfill and never had to worry about the effort or personal interpretation determined top grades in America.

Our children admired the patri of their Russian schoolmates an occasional glimpses they got of communal spirit. Given a choice, think that the price of the free you must give up, and the confo you must submit to in order to tain those values are too high.

Leona Schecter is co-author— her husband, Jerrold, a correspon for Time magazine, and their children, Evelind, Steven, Kate, Dean and Barnet—of "An American F in Moscow," published last yea Little, Brown.

Individualizing College Instruction Through Self-Pacing

'Keller Plan,' Gaining Acceptance, Requires Unit-by-Unit Mastery

By LARRY VAN DYNE

Thirty years ago Fred Keller was looking for a better way to teach Morse code to soldiers. The method he devised and later developed into a sophisticated teaching technique is now one of the fastest spreading innovations in college classrooms.

The "personalized system of instruction" or "Keller plan" was introduced at the new University of Brasília in the early 1960's. It is now used by a variety of schools, among them Brown University, for teaching English composition, and Northeastern University in Boston, for teaching introductory psychology. At Grand Valley State College in Michigan it is the dominant teaching method for an entire school.

It also has begun to develop the trappings of a national movement—a specialized journal of research, workshops for training professors, and a national clearinghouse at Georgetown University, directed by J. Gilmour Sherman, once a graduate student of Mr. Keller's who is often credited with helping originate the idea.

Mr. Keller, who dropped out of school as a teen-ager in 1915 and took a job in the local telegraph office, tried to learn Morse code in his spare time—"a long, frustrating job," he recalls that "led me to wonder if there were easier ways of mastering a skill."

By the time Mr. Keller—now in his 70's and living in retirement in South Carolina—had worked out the better way for the United States Army in World War II he had gone back to school, got a Ph.D from Harvard (where he knew B. F. Skinner) and a job teaching psychology at Columbia. The method he devised for the Army, drawn partly from Skinner's theories, was simple: a trainee was given a code signal, asked to identify it and then was told at once whether he was right or wrong. The routine went on until the trainee could get 100 signals correct.

An example of how the personalized system of instruction now works in college classrooms can be found in a general psychology course being offered to about 15 freshmen and sophomores this fall by Prof. Ronald Lazar at Georgetown University.

Normally an introductory course in psychology would follow the familiar lecture format.

Professor Lazar's course is different. While other professors were preparing or revising their lectures, he was carefully grouping scores of elementary concepts in psychology into 12 sequential "units." Each unit contained about a dozen concepts he would expect students to master (the functions of the lobes of the cortex for instance). He prepared a "study guide," pointing out for students the pages in the textbooks that covered each concept.

The course meets twice a week. Instead of lecturing, Professor Lazar circulates through the room answering questions and offering encouragement as students pore over their textbooks and study guides and take short "unit-mastery" quizzes covering each unit.

These quizzes are the heart of the method, because a student is allowed to take them at any time. This "self-pacing" means that some students may end up taking one quiz a week while others move much faster.

The catch is that a student must completely master one unit before moving on to the next. Under Mr. Lazar's rules the student proves the mastery of a unit by scoring at least 90 percent on a quiz. If the student fails to attain that, there is no penalty. She or he simply studies some more and tries another version of the test. Even the weakest students, Mr. Lazar has found, prove their mastery of a unit on their second or third try.

Lectures are retained in these courses, but only to supplement the textbooks, study guides, and quizzes—more for motivation than to transmit information. Grades are determined not by how many questions a student misses or how many times a quiz is taken, but on how many units a student has mastered by the end of the course.

This insistence on mastery of each unit—although arrived at independently by Mr. Keller in only one of numerous elements of his system—is philosophically similar to the no of Benjamin Blooom, a Universit Chicago professor whose "ma teaching" concept is attracting creased attention in the lower sc

The method has its critics. Mr. acknowledges that it may be l suited for disciplines in which it is for a teacher to decide with great sion what he wants students to

Some critics frown on the pr of giving A's to every student who ters all units, which often means of the class. The ability of the gr system to differentiate the bes dents from the average is lost, s critics.

So be it, says Mr. Keller. "All say is that if they met the require and the requirements were stiff, deserve the A's. When we pass for our driver's license, they don' us a B license or a C license.

"We all know that there are ences in people. But we want to prove that they understand; no they are different."

The New York Times
No. 1 in education advertising

When you teach reading, the best first step is to make kids want to read.

That's what they've done at the Pulaski Street School in Riverhead.

A lot of the fifth and sixth grade youngsters at the Pulaski Street School arrive for classes early because their parents drop them off on the way to work. But it's not wasted time for them at all because The New York Times is there ahead of them. They don't have to read The Times on their own time, but a great many do. Because they want to.

They learned to enjoy reading from teachers like Debbie Rosen, Keith Watson, Connie Nicholls, John Neely, Mary Ann Llewellyn and Bernard Freedon who worked with a Times education specialist to use The Times as a teaching aid in every subject from social studies to arithmetic. The basic idea was to improve reading skills with a basic text that quickly became as familiar as an old friend.

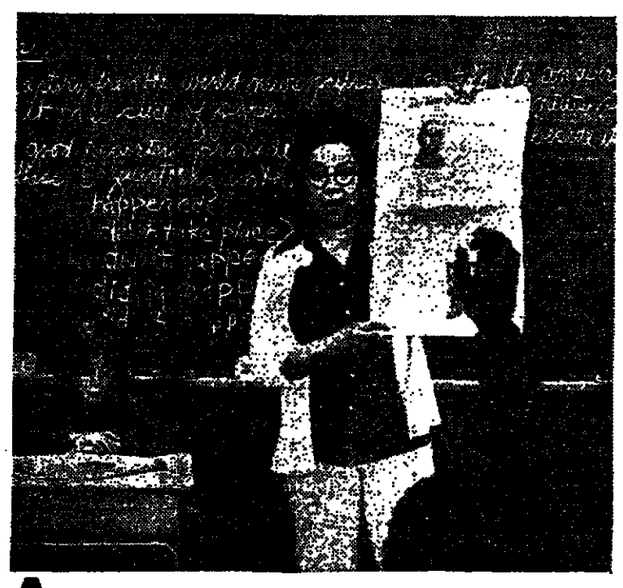
The idea worked. And not just with the students. As Principal Edward Goldstein puts it, "When we buy The Times for our classes, we're not just buying a paper, we're buying training for teachers."

Before The Times began arriving every morning at this eastern Long Island school, the teachers participated in workshops to learn how to use it in their classes. After the program started, they began learning more about the youngsters they see each day. They found out through discussions of advertising in The Times how their students see themselves. They discovered what interests them and were able to turn those interests into positive learning experiences.

One teacher, who admits to having been skeptical at the start, now says he'd be "willing to scrap the regular social studies program for The Times."

Although the goal was to improve reading skills, Mr. Goldstein says the program works in other ways, too. It helps students keep up at all ability levels, he says. And it increases their self-image.

Teachers at the Pulaski Street School are enthusiastic about the way The Times encourages class discussion, how it increases vocabulary skills, how it improves awareness. One teacher noticed that "they enjoy the idea of having text material they can cut up or write on. And their parents look forward to getting the paper at home each afternoon."



And does it improve reading skills? Well, drop around to Pulaski Street School some morning and see for yourself. But get there early, before the kids get too involved with The New York Times.

Shouldn't your children have the same advantages?

The reading program at the Pulaski Street School is at work in hundreds of other schools all over the Northeast. The cost is just 10 cents a day per student, half the regular newsstand price for The Times. The cost includes delivery each school day, plus a variety of supplementary materials to help teachers as well as students. The cost also includes the services of an educational specialist who works with the school in developing a program that fits the school's curriculum as well as its special needs. Crossword puzzle fans: What's a five-letter word for wentletrap

Wentletrap

That was 116 across in the Sunday Times crossword puzzle a while back. If you're stumped for the answer, just move by small degrees to the nearest Webster's and you'll find it.

If you're looking for more meaning in your life, do the puzzle every day in The New York Times, and on Sunday in The New York Times Magazine. Careful, though—it can be habit forming.

The New York Times

We are not The University of Arno

But a noted historian recently remarked that our publishing programs, taken together, could well be the core of a university education—and that the distinguished men and women of learning who have worked with us to create these imaginative programs constitute a faculty as outstanding as that of nearly any existing institution of higher learning.
Needless to say, we were indeed flattered by this observation.
It has in fact been our purpose as a publisher to provide programs that further teaching and research—programs that give historical perspective on problems and issues of critical and persistent importance.
We take this opportunity to tell you who and what we are.
